There was not much answering left for Mr. Steiner to do, and he therefore reviewed the hostile criticisms briefly and made his bow. The audience gave him a round of applause, in which the writer attempted to join, but his hands being occupied in supporting an infant phenomenon whom the speeches of the evening had thrown into a profound slumber, he had recourse to his heels, one of which came down on the foot of a young woman in the next chair, and the demonstration was cut short. Mr. Steiner will please accept this in explanation of any lack of enthusiasm on the part of the undersigned which he may have observed.

A Word from C. B. Reynolds.

To the Friends in Washington and Oregon:

While fully realizing the deplorable depression and stagnation of industry affecting all parts of the Sound country, we must not permit the good work for mental liberty to retrograde. The spirit of self-sacrifice that has accomplished so much in both Washington and Oregon should be emulated by all friends of the cause. If they will but do the little—all they can—the lecturers and other workers will redouble their efforts and continue in the lead.

Katie Kehm Smith, Nettie A. Olds, and Mrs. A. E. Barker have accomplished grand results in Oregon. Permanent churches, with large and most enthusiastic Sunday-schools, have been established at Portland, Forest Grove, and McMinnville. Mrs. Smith is now helping onward the good work at Silverton, where the Sunday-school is a mighty power for good.

The best results, the only sure, effective, continuous progress, must come, I firmly believe, through the Oregon plan, so successfully inaugurated by Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith. Establish Sunday-schools, with kindergarten classes; make the exercises intensely interesting, alike to old and young, by lessons in natural philosophy, recitations, vocal and instrumental music, calisthenics, etc. Have a regular lecturer. If it is impracticable at first to have a lecture every week, then have one every two or three weeks, or monthly; but start the school and hold it every Sunday.

I have buckled on the armor anew and reentered the lecture field, to devote my entire time to the work. Applications for lectures or for information with regard to Sunday-school work, lesson leaves, etc., will receive prompt attention. During my stay in Oregon lecture engagements that I cannot meet will be filled by Mrs. F. C. Reynolds. Yours for reason, right, and truth, C. B. REYNOLDS.

Box 118, Fremont, King Co., Wash.

The Oregon church taxation bill was killed in the Senate committee room. The story of the fight and defeat is very interestingly told by Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith in an article to appear next week.

News and Notes.

I leave Trinidad on Tuesday, February 26th, for Marysville, Kansas. I have to pursue a somewhat roundabout journey, staying over night at Burlingame, Kan., going thence to Manhattan, where I have to wait about three hours for the Blue Valley train, arriving at Marysville on Thursday afternoon at half-past four. I find a good welcome here. This is one of the old Kansas towns. The mountains of Colorado have now disappeared, and a vast prairie stretches on every side. Marysville is a place of about three thousand inhabitants. It has over half a dozen churches. There is quite a German element, and an excellent Turner organization which breathes the Liberal spirit in a social and educational way. It has a membership of over four hundred. It has a fine hall—a gymnasium—and ranks as one of the leading societies in the state. I lecture in their hall, and, beginning with Thursday evening, the audiences constantly increase. On Sunday, however, a Kansas blizzard breaks in upon us, and I adjourn Sunday evening, so that I lecture on Monday and Tuesday evenings of this week, when, fortunately, the blizzard has disappeared and we have fine weather. On the last evening the hall is filled almost to its capacity. I give a lecture on "Evolution and Creation." The matter has been quite widely discussed here. Professor Snow, of the State University, delivered some interesting lectures with illustrations, etc., demonstrating the position of science to-day. The Methodist minister wouldn't stand this. He sailed into the professor with all his colors flying. He stood by the Mosaic account, and showed to the entire satisfaction of the orthodox believer that modern science was not in it, and that Professor Snow must take a back seat. It was a favorable opportunity to declare the Freethought philosophy of the whole matter, which I accordingly did. The weak point of Professor Snow was his endeavor to reconcile Genesis with evolution. The strong point of the Methodist clergyman was his total ignorance of modern science, and his unquestioning faith in the Bible. It is too bad that a man of Professor Snow's ability should be hampered by that old myth.

It is well known that the Turners are entirely with us on the Demands of Liberalism. These are a part of their own platform. It is gratifying to find that this organization is increasing. Other nationalities besides the German are being admitted, and it is becoming a cosmopolitan institution. Of course the clergy do not like it a bit; but it is too firmly entrenched at Marysville for them to enter the lists against it.

Marysville was one of the stations on the old stage line. This was the last important point before starting across the plains for Denver. Here is where the supplies were mainly laid in for the long journey. Brigham Young and his company went on this trail. The early settlers who stuck to business made large fortunes in this section.

Near by is what they call "Hangman's tree," where a large number of desperadoes have swung off into eternity, with their boots on. There was very little delay in the execution of justice. Much of the old pro-slavery struggle also surged around this point. It was originally called "Palmetto," but is now Marysville, after the name of the wife of the original pioneer, Marshall, after whom the county is named, of which Marysville is the county seat, with a $45,000 building, which is an ornament to the place. The Catholic church is an enormous building, overlooking the town like an ancient cathedral. There are two Lutheran churches, a Baptist, a Presbyterian, a Methodist, and an Episcopalian. There is even a "Christian Science" assembly. I understand that they cure horses of the colic, etc., by "Christian science," and also hogs of the hog-cholera. It is wonderful how this "belief" prevails, and its adherents become so infatuated that they would rather die by "Christian science" than survive by the use of medicine. For a city of its size Marysville has certainly a vast variety of human nature.

It is admirably situated on the bluffs of the Blue river, not on a level prairie. One can have a view of the whole of it from the heights around, as it spreads along the declivities, with its fine blocks, elegant residences, and public buildings. The banks of the Blue river roll away precipitously for about five miles, and then the great level floor of the prairie country appears. This gives many attractive and picturesque views about Marysville.

It is a good farming and stock country, and seldom lacks for crops of some kind. It is not dependent on any one thing; and the people weather the hard times quite comfortably. Here is the "golden mean" without the extremes of good or ill-fortune.

Mr. Sidney Walter is one of our main workers, a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He came here in 1871. He has grown with the country and shares its prosperity, although he has not been on the side of the Lord. He has cultivated the earth and made his own way. I had the pleasure of visiting his home, which occupies a commanding position just outside the town limits and from whence spreads a stately panorama of the country along the Blue river. I am sorry that Mrs. Walter, a staunch Freethinker, was not able to attend the lectures on account of sickness. The daughter, Miss Lottie, is quite a devoted admirer of the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Dr. D. A. Wilson is another of our supporters, who has been through all the fortunes of this country as a physician. He has traveled day and night sometimes. He is kept constantly busy. The Christians do not boycott him, for he has the knack of keeping death off if there's any chance; and even the Christians like that kind of a doctor. The doctor also enjoys farming and stock raising. He delights in horseflesh, and has studied its evolution with great success. He is now owner of the finest race-horse in the state, and it may be in the world. The name of the horse is "Kansas." He is certainly a magnificent steed, and will no doubt cover his native sod with laurels.

I was pleased to meet Mr. and Mrs. Jerome Carter, who came in ten miles facing a northwest storm on Sunday to hear the lecture. They came the same distance on Monday and Tuesday evenings. Mrs. Carter was formerly of New York, a member of the Society of Humanity, and is well acquainted with the rank and file of Manhattan Liberals. Her son, named after Wakeman and Searing, is a staunch Freethinker. He also traveled the ten miles to attend the lectures. Mrs. Carter was formerly Ella J. Burke, and I presume her New York Liberal friends will remember her, although she has been out on these prairies about fifteen years, and has prospered. But she does not forget the old guard of New York among whom her youth of Freethought was spent.

I have enjoyed the hospitality of the Turner society. The members of the society here have won some of the first prizes in national tournaments. They are certainly skilled gymnasts. They have large classes in the gymnasium; and even the church members are beginning to attend and cultivate muscle.

About fifty names have been added to the roll of the Federation. Undoubtedly a local club could be started. There is good material. Of course many are afraid to make an open declaration. But it is easily seen that Freethought is on the gain. The audiences, especially at the last two lectures, were excellent. At the first two lectures there were no women, and only one on Sunday afternoon; but since then the number has been largely increased. This present campaign has developed growth in the community. I am sure that the Freethought colors will never cease to float in this Liberal atmosphere.

Mr. August Holme is president of the Turner society and mayor of the city, a genial and cultivated Liberal. Sam Foster is teacher of the classes in gymnastics, and is remarkably proficient, as shown by the success of his pupils. Dr. Scammon, Dr. Edwards, Dr. Cottrell, Emil Draheim are among the many friends I met. Also Wm. Lofinck, who has been on the frontier at Anacortes, Wash., and kept the flag floating on the Pacific coast. The Cottrell Bros. and family at Hull make a host in themselves. They are enrolled for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also David Schaub, Charley A. Bohner, Rudolf A. Krause, and Jerome Carter. The Pacific Hotel agreeably entertained the Secular Pilgrim. Both Liberalism and art prevail. Mrs. Waterson has a fine artistic genius, so that the eye of the traveler is delighted with beautiful pictures and designs while partaking of a good square meal. In every respect I have enjoyed my week's work among this generous company of Kansas Liberals, who in the heart of the continent keep the campfires glowing in the march of freedom.

A Stirring Letter from Louis Levine.

MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: In sending you $5 for immediate use in your educational work for equal justice as enunciated in the Liberal platform, I would be glad if it might have been a hundredfold. Printed matter is needed, and in quantity, that will tersely and unanswerably set forth and drive home each demand. Let us be candid. Can your thousands of readers realize how very little they do to uphold the working few? These heartily give for their principles the best of themselves; too often at ill-afforded sacrifice. These do the work that should be shared by the many, but who to all purposes are not much in evidence!

The churches are answered abundantly in their call for "mission funds" for the heathen (!) of distant lands when the wretched poor live distracted and distressed at home! We have our heathen here, with the lucre they affect to despise, a means of constant menace, and calling for eternal vigilance on the part of those who labor disadvantageously through hesitancy of substantial and timely assistance, in opposition to palpable injustice. It seems to me a genuine claim—one that may expect response. Let those well able give more; others less; but ALL some!

"It is better to keep the wolf out of the fold than trust to drawing his teeth and claws after he has entered" is a Jeffersonian aphorism. Now, I would put this to every reader seriously: What can or will you do to safeguard the "fold" first? To civilize the "wolf" is an all-time effort. In both, all should engage heartily. Come, let us get together! The Secular flag is nailed to the stanch staff of Right. To stay there! Justice and common sense shall decide it must and shall wave for inspiration and aspiration FOR ALL!

Sincerely,

LOUIS LEVINE.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening in German Masonic Hall, 320 East 15th street, New York, at 8 o'clock. Program for March:

March 15th—"The Two Heavens One." T. B. Wakeman.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Long Island Business College, South 8th street, between Bedford and Driggs avenues. Program for March:

March 17th—"The Fallacies of Henry George." Henry Nichols.

THE Ohio Liberal Society meets every Sunday evening in G. A. R. Hall, 115 W. Sixth st., Cincinnati. Program for March will be filled by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel on the following subjects:

March 17th—"The Sermon on the Mount Analyzed."

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 2:30 and 7:30, every Sunday in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Freethought publications are on sale at the meeting.

The Rev. W. H. Gill gives his second reply to Colonel Ingersoll's late lecture on the "Bible" on Sunday evening, March 17th, at 8.

FRANKLIN STEINER has been lecturing in the Eastern states during the past four weeks, closing in Boston on March 3d. Boston Liberals have engaged him to return and meet the Rev. Miles Grant, the Adventist champion, in a joint discussion. The reverend has signified a disposition to debate, and Mr. Steiner is prepared to meet him. Western Liberals may write Mr. Steiner for engagements in care of this office.

MATTIE P. KREKEL spoke to a fine audience in Cincinnati on Sunday evening, March 3d, on Sabbath laws. Persons desiring to secure Mrs. Krekel's services during the week, in March, near Cincinnati, should address her at 115 East Fifth street that city. Also those wishing lectures in Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Illinois, will please write to the same address. She should have no difficulty in obtaining appointments for every day of every month.

THAT earnest Liberal worker, L. DeWitt Griswold, of Elmira, N. Y., wants to explain to the Freethought lecturers who have written to him during the last year relative to lecture engagements, why he has not answered their letters. For a year Mrs. Griswold has been very ill, and at last she had to be removed to a hospital for treatment, and the home was closed, Mr. Griswold taking other quarters so as to be near his companion, whose sufferings caused him the most poignant anguish. He was obliged to suspend business entirely and his expenses have been very large.

J. E. REMSBURG has been lecturing in the Indian Territory. There are many Freethinkers in the territory; the educated native, many of them, having repudiated Christianity. Mr. Remsburg gave a course of lectures at each of the following towns: Watova in the Cherokee nation; Eufaula in the Creek nation; Krebs, Atoka, and Caddo in the Choctaw nation, and Grady, Duncan, and Ardmore in the Chickasaw nation. The meetings were generally well attended and the lectures well received. At Krebs the large Opera House was packed—every foot of standing room on the floor and on the stage being occupied. Mr. Remsburg gave his lecture on "False Claims," which was greeted with a storm of applause. The audience was not satisfied with one lecture and when it was learned that the lecturer's engagements would not permit him to remain over the following night, they compelled him to go on and give his lecture on "Thomas Paine." None left the hall, though hundreds had to stand nearly three hours.

Letters of Friends.

With Blushes We Thank You.

ARAGO, OR., Feb. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $4.50—subscription to your paper, and for the books named.

I wish that I could send a batch of new subscribers to your noble paper, for it is deserving of an immense circulation. It is doing more good than any other paper published, and should be read by everybody. Long may it and the Editor prosper.

J. McNAUGHTON.

Two More in the Fold.

WESTERN SPRINGS, ILL., Feb. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.10 for renewal of my subscription to the grand advocate of Freethought and reform, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Send the paper to the two persons named in my letter for three months on trial. I will try to get a Freethought lecturer out here some time in the spring or summer to stir up the religious people a little.

I remain yours in liberty and humanity,
NELS PEARSON.

For the Cause That is Good.

TRUXTON, N. Y., Feb. 20, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Within find $1.50—$1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER; the rest for THE ANNUAL, and Ingersoll's "About the Bible." I will try to get signers to the petition. I am doing all I can for liberty and justice. Will send a small sum to the Federation to-day; if it's only fifty cents it will go so far. You can depend on my doing all I can for Freethought.

Yours for the repeal of the Sunday laws and all other laws which are unjust, JOHN DEAN.

Religious Cruelty is the Worst.

LEXINGTON, Jan. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: A kind and noble Freethinker has made me a present of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I am reading it, and wonder how I could have existed so long without such a book.

It also contains excellent portraits of the author, the Lelands, Mr. D. M. Bennett, the great reformer and pioneer, as well as that of Mr. J. A. Greenhill, the noble Freethinker and philanthropist.

Cruelty is always detestable, but that fierceness which belongs to religion is intensified until it becomes fiendish and unnatural.

ALHAZA.

He Will be a Welcome Visitor.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN., Feb. 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $15, to be used as your best judgment may decide, viz., for the distribution of your pamphlet, "Church Property," or anti-Sabbatarian literature, or in propagating other Secular demands. Please apply it to use in New York state or in any other section where you think best. I am sorry I can not hand you a larger sum, as I have full faith in your earnest desire to do the best with the means at your command.

I am with you in all your desires for the final triumph of Freethought, and I think the old crust of superstition is beginning to break up under the blows of the able workers now laboring in the cause. I hope to call on you in New York, perhaps in the spring, if I stay on earth.

GILBERT LINCOLN.

Honest Taxation Enrages the Preachers.

TUCSON, ARIZ., Feb. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.30. Credit me with one year's subscription, and send two copies of "Church Property: Why It Should Not be Exempt from Taxation." We have stirred up the sky pilots here, and they are working themselves into a great rage on account of a petition we are circulating here to our legislature, asking the passage of a law taxing church property. In twenty-four hours we obtained 159 names, including many of the "solid" citizens of the town, and we will get many more before sending to the capital.

Friend Putnam worked up considerable enthusiasm while here. I hope Mrs. Freeman will come through this country and deliver a course of lectures before the enthusiasm subsides. She could call out the female population, and they need education in Freethought. Wishing our cause and your paper success, I am yours for liberty, ISAAC E. CRUM.

Asking Them to be Just.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Feb. 13, 295.

MR. EDITOR: I have consented to solicit signatures to the petition for the repeal of the law exempting church property in this state from taxation, yet I feel quite sure that Larmer could hardly have chosen a poorer solicitor, and I would not try at all if I did not know that it was only justice to all for which I am asking. Please send me a few leaflets on the above subject if you have them. Larmer tells me to present the petition blanks for signatures to the ministers first and lawyers next. I shall do as he directs, but with faint hopes of good results. It seems like bearding the lion in his den, the Douglass in his hall, to solicit signatures of the clergy, but perhaps some of them have the principle of justice in them, or patriotism enough not to rob and endanger the state for the benefit of the church, and are willing to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's.

GEO. F. ELLIOTT.

What One Man Did.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Feb. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please fill the inclosed order, for which I hand you $4.65: Two three months' trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER; six copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" including "Examination of the Prophecies," eight copies "Age of Reason," and one "The Bible."

Half of above subscriptions for the "Age of Reason" I got prepaid at a neighboring farmer's public sale inside of two hours, and the remainder I got in about the same time in Hagerstown, our county seat. It seems to me that if Freethinkers were to make more effort to disseminate this pioneer work of Paine's they would reap richer harvests of converts. Two persons whom I got to read the "Age of Reason" last fall have since subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER, on trial, and will probably continue permanently.

Much of the Freethought in this section I can trace back to the influence of my grandfather, who over forty years ago lent the "Age of Reason" to the parents or grandparents of the young Freethinkers here to-day.

Let us push the circulation of the "Age of Reason" until the world finally reaches that era we can truly call the age of reason. Yours for progress,
D. W. G.

For a Praiseworthy Purpose.

LORENA, TEX., Feb. 24, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: As I have not written in quite a while I now come and ask you to publish this. It is a scheme I have to do a little good to one of the most fearless and liberal reformers of Europe. And remember, friends, that the world is our country. I received a letter from Captain Otto Thomson yesterday, in which, in speaking of "Four Hundred Years," he said, "I have not yet had an opportunity to read 'Four Hundred Years of Freethought,' and perhaps never will be able to get that valuable work."

Captain Thomson was the leader of the Freethought movement in Sweden, but he is now in an embarrassed situation. He is old and his sun is nearly set. Let the Freethinkers of America be among the ones to cheer the old gentleman's declining years.

The scheme is this: Let us send enough money to the Truth Seeker Company to pay for a copy of "Four Hundred Years," and get Mr. Macdonald to present the same to Captain Thomson in our names as a tribute of regard and respect.

I will send $1 to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER as soon as there is enough additional promised to pay for the book.

Now, my dear friends, it will not take much from even a very few of you to carry out this scheme, and I'm sure that Mr. Macdonald will assist us.

Hoping my plan may receive the approbation of all my fellow Freethinkers, I am, yours fraternally,

WM. M. MATTHEWS.

Another Light in Covenant Land.

McKEESPORT, PA., Feb. 26, 295.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday evening consummated the formation of the McKeesport Philosophical and Ethical Society, being the first Liberal organization in this place. This city contains among its population some very advanced thinkers, yet organization did not assume tangible shape until some two or three weeks ago, when active work tending to the organization of the above-named society was inaugurated by Benjamin Hopkins and Mr. H. H. Fry. Mr. Hopkins is a veteran in years, having attained the ripe old age of seventy-six. Considering his age and state of health, he is far above the average in activity, especially in his zeal for the advancement of Freethought. And let me add that he is the ideal personification of one who demonstrates his convictions in his daily actions. He is the society's "patron saint." We expect ere long to be housed in a suite of rooms, where the friends of the society can be welcomed at all times. Through the courtesy of Dr. A. J. Gillis, we are at present meeting temporarily in his office-parlor, No. 414 Fifth avenue. The following are the names of those elected to the respective offices: President, Dr. A. J. Gillis; vice-president, B. Hopkins; treasurer, Kirkland Campbell; and the writer, secretary. I would like to make special mention of these gentlemen, but space forbids, yet some remarks concerning them may be made in a future letter on the progress of this society.

R. L. McCLURE.

Mattie A. Freeman in Ohio.

CINCINNATI, O., Feb. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. M. A. Freeman, of Chicago, delivered a lecture last Sunday evening before the Ohio Liberal Society upon the subject: "The Ideal of 1776." She was greeted by a large audience, and introduced by Mrs. E. P. Foster, who presided. Mrs. Freeman is a lecturer of marked ability and strikes straight out from the shoulder. She captivated her audience, which was composed of the intelligent, thinking people of this city.

At the close of her lecture there was a spirited discussion by those in the audience wishing to speak, and Mrs. Freeman answered them all in her pleasant and forcible manner, which pleased everybody. Mrs. Freeman is a credit to the Freethought platform, and should be constantly kept on the move. Do not let such a lecturer "rust."

There are so few women of brains and ability who have the moral courage to take the rostrum and denounce fraud, hypocrisy, and the relics we still have of the superstitions of past ages, that they should be kept busy enlightening the masses and curbing the encroachments of priestcraft and other enemies of Freethought and progress.

It will be with great pleasure that we can again listen to Mrs. Freeman, and I hope that she will be constantly engaged in removing the cobwebs from the eyes of the ignorant and priest-ridden masses of backward mental development.

Yours truly,
GEO. E. LIGHT,
Pres. Ohio Liberal Society.

Mortuary—Nehemiah Kile.

BENTON, PA., Jan. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Observation has taught us that deer on a dry day seek a high, airy mountain, and just before a storm they go into a deep swamp for shelter, and when they are disturbed they cross from one swamp to another, or from one mountain to another. In the wilds of northern Pennsylvania, five miles from any habitation, is cut on a tree in bold letters, "N. K." There the deer cross from one swamp to another or from one mountain to another. This place is known by hunters as Nehemiah Kile's Crossing. Nehemiah Kile was born in the forty-second year of our independence; he died January 23d, in the 119th year of the American Republic. He lived independent of church or creed, and many a Christian could well afford to accept his example. He was buried by the church, but they seemed to have no hope for him; yet he was a good neighbor, a kind husband, and a loving father, and amid all the tangling ways of the world he succeeded in keeping the wolf of want from the door of his family; but the church asserts the necessity of each and all taking out a church policy, something like a fire insurance policy, and keeping it paid up so that we can be ready at all times to compare our assets with our liabilities; and Kile's wife, leaning over the box, said in blind-tears, "O Nehemiah, if only you had been a Christian!"

Now, of all the wicked things in earth or outer space, it is the church destroying the last lingering ray of hope of a weeping child at a loving father's grave. Oh, how long must intelligence sit upon a barbed wire fence and see these unintelligent hosts go by.

I will be a subscriber soon as I can get another subscription. My brother-in-law takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read it. We are going to try to build a Freethought hall in Benton the coming summer. I will try to be of use to your paper yet.

GEO. R. HESS.

Scripture Not Adapted to Preachers' Use.

ST. JOHN, KAN., Feb. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3—$2 of which place to my credit on subscription, and send me "Age of Reason," "Examination of the Prophecies," ANNUAL, "All About the Holy Bible," and "The Bible Against Itself."

Freethought is well represented in our county officers. Our representative to the legislature was elected in 1888, 1890, 1892, and again in 1894. The clerk of the district court was elected in 1892 and in 1894. One county commissioner in 1892. All are Infidels. While we have many other good citizens in this county who are Infidels, we failed in two attempts to get a Freethought lecturer to come here and deliver a course of lectures. The Methodist Episcopal church held a revival meeting for seven consecutive weeks at St. John, and during this time the church requested that all places of business should be closed at seven P. M., except, of course, where the sky-pilot sells passes to heaven. One night some of the mischievous boys of the town took the rubber off the preacher's bicycle. Instead of acting in accordance with the precept as laid down by Christ, per Mat. v, 39, "But I say unto you, Resist not evil," very promptly the next morning the minister had the boys arrested, tried, and fined for meddling with one of God's servants' property. If the Bible is a divinely inspired book, as is claimed for it, it must be perfect, plain, and practical; if it lacks in any of those essentials, the claim must be erroneous. It seems to me that it lacks in all three of these parts. If the Bible were perfect, there would be no self-contradictions. If it were plain, there would not be so many different creeds or opinions formed by reading the same book. It is impracticable, as is shown by reading Mat. v, 39, 44; vi, 25; Mark xvi, 17, 18; Mat. xxi, 21, etc. I have never seen the person who could practice those precepts.

A. J. HASTER.

Expensive Professional Soul-Savers.

PLEASANTDALE, ME., Feb. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please mail to the address inclosed Ingersoll's "The Holy Bible," and the ANNUAL.

Not having seen any communication from Maine to your paper for some time, and never from my town—Cape Elizabeth—I take the liberty and, I may add, pleasure, of writing to you.

I have taken your paper for a number of years and find it not only a truth seeker; but a truth speaker. When Ingersoll gave his lecture on the Bible in Portland, it so frightened the holy parsons that all gave notice from their pulpits that some time during the month they would fire a broadside, loaded with scripture, directly at him. Even Sam Pearsons, the city missionary, who has been working in the Lord's vineyard for twenty years laying up treasures in Portland, gave notice to the same effect, but he did not come to time for the reason there was nothing in it for Sam. But the parsons who did try to answer him got into such a dispute among themselves that they gave it up for a bad job. They felt, however, as though they really should do something to offset Ingersollism, so they made arrangements for a grand revival. The following, copied from a Cape Elizabeth paper, will show you how the revival came out:

A pretty good story was told the writer by a reliable Portland gentleman, which goes to bear out the assertion that even the "saving of souls" depends greatly on the almighty dollar. As known, the city ministers are greatly anxious that a revival shall take place there, a feeling being prevalent that Maine's metropolis is rather inclined Babylonianwards. There being no Dr. Parkhurst handy, it has been thought best to engage evangelists to wake the city up to the evils of the hour. Two famous ones were recently written to for terms. The reply was startling, and convinced the good Portland parsons that they were rather behind the times as concerns the modern methods of conversion. The evangelists, after stating the amount of cash they required (a goodly sum), added that they should also expect a certain price for each sinner brought to God. In other words, they demanded a tariff on each soul saved—put a price on every convert's head. A plan similar to the killing of hogs in Chicago.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Feb. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For the first time since I became a Freethinker I have failed to do the needful service of presenting petitions to persons asking for their signatures for the purpose of abrogating laws, made in the past, prejudicial to the rights of the people; but to-day I have to acknowledge an entire failure. I am not sick, but I do not go out at all in the winter, walking; I am not sure of my standing, and though 'tis not a pleasant thing to be old, 'twould be worse to be crippled. I have hoped each day that some one would call upon me whom I could ask to take the petition in regard to the Sunday law and circulate it, but as yet no such person has appeared. Of the many disagreeable things which age brings with it, the feeling of utter uselessness is the hardest; the world is full of needs, and to sit and fold one's hands, useless, is mortifying to one's pride. My eyes are good (I wish my ears were), and I read nearly half of the hours that make the day. The frightful storm which we have just passed through deprived me of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 9th, and made me feel as perhaps the devout Catholic does who loses the beads, that his connection with his God is broken; however, Investigator and Open Court reached me, and yesterday came the last TRUTH SEEKER. One cannot easily be lonely with "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" in the house, and though I have read it consecutively twice through, I find it very pleasant, when waiting for the book from the library, to take up that and commune with the dear ones now living, and some of the more dear, alas! gone. If I only were rich I would give to every Freethinker, not able to buy the book, a copy, and say, "Read it thoroughly, and never again call yourself uneducated." I am getting very proud of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think the editor and publisher has shown wondrous ability both as editor and publisher, improving it each week. It was a masterly stroke of business putting a second Macdonald into the paper, and "Notes and News." Does Mr. Putnam write while he sleeps, as it used to be said dear Mr. Bennett did? Old as I am, I want to live long enough to see that "book of poetry" by Putnam and Macdonald. Well, I must not make my article too long lest it crowd out something that is of more importance, and so, with kindly greeting to all who read the TRUTH SEEKER, I am, dear Mr. Editor,

Yours always, LUCY N. COLMAN.

A Suggestion.

ALMA, TENN., Feb. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We have had a great awakening here. A divine apostle has been preaching here for several weeks, and the result is that several poor, ignorant, deluded, superstitious persons profess to have obtained salvation. I have talked with some of them, but I can make no headway with them. They have all been well posted by their shepherds not to converse with "Infidels." The old trick has been imposed upon them—"faith is above reason." It occurs to me that there is a way by which these people may be reached. It is a waste of time to ask them to read anything written by Atheists, Agnostics, or Deists. The other day the Cincinnati Post published an extract from a sermon preached by the Rev. Lyman Abbott to the effect that the account of the fall of Adam was only a legend. Another man, who lives here, cut this extract out of the Post, and showed it to some of the "faithful." They read it carefully. This afforded me an opportunity to point out to them the fact that if man never fell from grace no atonement was necessary; therefore, if the story about Adam's fall was false, there being no necessity for a redeemer, it necessarily followed that no Jesus ever existed. This opened their eyes. They thought seriously about it, but said nothing. Since then I have tried to get them to read some advanced thinkers' works, but I have failed. I have adopted another plan: Some years ago I carefully read and studied the Rev. Robert Taylor's "Diegesis." At the time I read this work I remember I was very much surprised to find that the most fatal evidences against Christianity contained in that able work were quotations from the works of the most eminent divines and ecclesiastical scholars, men who sat down to write in defense of Christianity, but who in reality produced incontrovertible evidence that Christianity was built upon forged documents and myths. I remember, also, that when I was a Disciple the church publishing department used to scatter broadcast leaflets, or small tracts, costing from ten to twenty cents a hundred. These leaflets or tracts did not contain much argument, but scriptural quotations were abundant. Now, would it not be a good propagandist idea to select one thought, say the inspiration of the scriptures, and quote from the writings of the Rev. Henry Preserved Smith, of Cincinnati, or the Rev. Dr. Briggs, of New York, sufficient to prove scripture was not inspired? Then, again, take the gospels, and quote from Dr. Lardner the passages that that eminent divine declared were spurious. Furthermore, you might get up a leaflet containing the three chronological lists (one in Chronicles and the ones in Matthew and Luke) of the house of David, and add Paine's argument to it. These ignorant bigots would read what the reverend gentlemen said. I think it would be possible to reach these poor deluded people, and they could be induced to read the works of our most advanced thinkers if we could only first of all get them to doubt the authenticity and inspiration of the scriptures. A leaflet containing a few of the most point blank contradictions would also be useful, for the Rev. Ignoramus still maintains there is no such thing as a contradiction in the Bible. Another might contain the number of Bibles in existence and the number of believers in each mythical system of religion, etc. Money is now very scarce, so it seems to me a great deal of good might be done in this way at very little expense.

Respectfully yours, J. P.

Earnest Plea for Freethought Education.
JANESVILLE, WIS., Feb. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been much interested and edified by the reports published in the TRUTH SEEKER of the good work being done by the Oregon State Secular Union, and especially so of the system of Sunday-school work they have inaugurated. I think we should begin to devote a great deal of attention to the organization of Secular Sunday-schools. Wherever there is a little band of Liberals an effort should be made to get them to organize a Liberal Sunday-school. An efficient Sunday school once established a strong Secular union is sure in time to be established. Among the Liberal churches, for instance, the Unitarians and Universalists, it has been found that where they can establish a strong and active Sunday-school, a church is certain in time to follow. There is no reason why the same rule should not hold good as to a Secular union as well, and unquestionably it will. And the result will be that in a few years we will have great circles of Secular unions with paid lecturers.

Let us therefore bring all our influence to bear to urge on Liberals all over the country that it is their imperative duty both as regards the right bringing up of their children and the safety of the state, that they organize Secular Sunday-schools. The fate of this country lies in the hands of the children; therefore it is our bounden duty to see that they are firmly grounded in a right knowledge of their duties toward society and the state, and are themselves blessed with self-respecting, independent minds capable of calmly judging as to what is truth. To this end it is imperatively necessary that we go to work to manufacture a suitable Sunday-school literature for our purpose. Let all Liberals who have a literary bent take hold of this matter and lend a helping hand in creating such a literature. And let all the Liberals in the field—the lecturers—seek to impress upon the people the imperative necessity of forming Secular Sunday-schools, if we are going to give our work stability and permanent value. I believe that wonders can be accomplished in this direction by the use of a little persuasion and energy.

As to literature already in existence suitable to our purpose, Tuttle's "Lyceum Guide," used by Spiritualistic societies, contains much that would be admirably adapted to our purpose and scarcely anything to which Liberals could object. Gould's "Beginnings," published by the Western Unitarian Association, is also a book perfectly adapted to our purpose, in teaching the children the origin of the earth, and of life and human society and language, and the various complex relations and customs which make up the sum of modern civilization. The book is entirely Rationalistic, and treats all the subjects from a strictly scientific point of view. It contains nothing to which any Freethinker would object. Then there are various little text books on ethics which could do important service.

As to the literature we must create, what is needed first? We need a series of lessons which shall make clear to the youthful mind the meaning and purpose of the Nine Demands. Also another series explaining the struggle for religious and mental liberty, a series, in fact, which shall make clear to the child at how vast a price in treasure and blood and sacrifice of life mankind has purchased Freethought, and instill into their minds a deep sense of how precious a treasure it is, and how important it is that we seek in every way to cherish and protect it. Yours fraternally,

MORRIS M. BOSTWICK.

Talmage's Wonderful Discovery.

CLINT, TEX., Feb. 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been remiss in remitting for your paper, not but that my love for the cause is unremitting nor on the wane, but the supply of dinero, like the waters of the Rio Grande, dries up at certain seasons of the year, and does not keep pace with my desire to plentifully irrigate Freethought publications with a golden stream.

I wish I could live to see the time when every religious paper in the land is supplanted by TRUTH SEEKERS, Investigators, and like publications, and every pulpit filled by a Liberal, philosopher, or scientific lecturer. Am afraid that would make me a very old man, for the poison of orthodox superstition has been transmitted from father to son through the ages, and the long established priesthood will die hard. Like any other corporation or trust, they claim the "vested right" to work the mine of human ignorance and folly for all there is in it, and levy for their saintly services all that the traffic will bear. They have got a big scare on them now, these inspired soldiers of the cross, because of the indisputable revelations of science and the exposure of their past hideous record of blood and slavery, and they are "girding up their loins" for more determined battle, and plotting, one with another, Catholic and Protestant, how best to perpetuate their Bible faiths and fetishes, and by this means hold on to the offices and emoluments.

In this they are aided and abetted by nearly all the secular papers in the country, which, for the patronage and pay it brings them, publish all sorts of religious rot and cant, and habitually speak of the crafty men, who are aiming at the overthrow of our republic (by working for the union of church and state, and the enthronement of Jesus as king over all), as "princes of the church," "his eminence," or "his excellence," or "his reverence" so and so, and what astonishingly pious and learned and holy men of God they are; all of which is enough to make a Freethought dog regurgitate could he know what hypocrites and ignoramuses many of them are, and many more, consciously or unconsciously, enemies of mental liberty and human progress.

It is not pleasurable to contemplate this battle between light and darkness, between reason and science on the one hand, and superstition and priestcraft on the other, and see intelligent men, who know better, in trade, in politics, and in professional life, siding with religionists and publicly patronizing the churches whose teachings they privately condemn, all through fear of losing a customer, or a client, or a seat in Congress, or the like.

Look at our Christian civilization—see the spiritual head of the only true church whining and howling at Rome over lost temporal power, and for swords and soldiers to enforce his infallible decrees; seeking to put out the torch of human reason and investigation and turn the world back to the dark ages of childish credulity and ignorance, and blind faith in miracles and mysteries. The heretical Protestant sects are only behind popery in the lack of unity and organization. Christian nations, hating each other, are armed to the teeth to repel Christian invasion, or plunder and murder the defenseless "heathen" to propagate the religion of Christ, and incidentally replenish their depleted treasuries. Our own beloved government "of the people, by and for the people," is fast becoming an oligarchy with the plutocrats and priests on top, and the millions moiling in misery and poverty. Contrast this much-lauded civilization with the splendid achievements of Egypt, Greece, or Rome in those remote periods, and what have we, "the heir of all the ages," to brag of, and where is the guarantee that the coming centuries will not bury all that we now boast of as deeply under the waves of oblivion as have been buried the ancient Persians and Egyptians, their gods and their creeds?

Reviewing the history of man for the last nineteen hundred years under the benign influence of the Christian religion, it makes one feel sad, together with a certain feeling of disgrace, that he belongs to a race so incorrigible and hard to redeem, and that evidently grows worse under the application of the very means God is said to have appointed for its salvation. The boldest and wickedest of us had about concluded that, somehow, the deity had made a mess of the whole business, when recently the true cause of all the trouble has been revealed to us through the high priest and prophet of these latter days, the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, who tells us that the opening of Pandora's box upon earth was a special provision of the deity for the benefit of his more favored children in the other innumerable worlds that spin through space, and who are gifted with telescopic eyes that they may look upon the terrible effects of disobedience in this nether sphere. We are being made an object lesson for the benefit of the ethereal inhabitants of all the other planets, and the cursedness and consequent misery of the descendants of Adam and Noah are holding them in their dutiful and loving adherence to the throne. Well, well! this great problem of the origin of evil, which the fathers and philosophers have tackled in vain for thousands of years, has, through the goodness and mercy of God, been solved by his favored spokesman, Talmage. Now there is comfort for us such as Judas doubtless solaced himself with when he reflected that but for his sordid avarice and bottomless depravity the whole world would have been damned for the lack of a crucified savior. Amen! Hallelujah! Brother Talmage, give us a shake of your heavenly flipper!

So then are all essentially bad, and must stay so (save a few of the elect who are to be snatched as brands from the burning) for the edification of the aristocracy of Saturn and Jupiter and the rest of them. And so I am going to try to be as bad as I can be in order that the other fellows may be as good as they can be; hence I am going to continue to subscribe to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, to be still more wicked, send as a copy of the "Prose Poems and Selections" of our head devil, Ingersoll; also a copy of the ANNUAL, for all of which find inclosed $5.75.

Yours, hoping that the Lord will somewhere let up on us and give us a show with the rest of 'em, S. G. ETHERIDGE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Father and Child.

A SONG THAT SINGS ITSELF.

Light of the morning,
Darling of dawning,
Blithe little, lithe little daughter of mine!
While with thee ranging Sure I'm exchanging
Sixty of my years for six like thine.
Wings cannot vie with thee,
Lightly I fly with thee,
Gay as the thistle-down over the lea;
Life is all magic,
Comic or tragic,
Played as thou playest it daily with me,
Floating and ringing
Thy merry singing
Comes when the light comes, like that of the birds—
List to the play of it!
That is the way of it:
All's in the music and naught in the word—
Glad or grief laden,
Schubert or Haydn
Ballad of Erin or merry Scotch lay,
Like an evangel
Some baby angel
Brought from sky-nursery stealing away.
Surely I know it
Artist nor poet
Guesses my treasure of jubilant hours,
Sorrows, what are they?
Nearer or far, they Vanish in sunshine, like dew from the flowers.
Years, I'm glad of them!
Would that I had of them
More and yet more, while thus mingled with thine.
Age, I make light of it,
Fear not the sight of it,
Time's but our playmate, whose toys are divine.

Marion Hepburn's Heresy.

[CONCLUDED.]

At the great department stores she heard "Inexperienced!" They wanted girls for three or four dollars a week. It was not enough to pay her board. Teachers were wanted, but well-recommended ones, without the least suspicion of unbelief. What a hideous reality this world was becoming to Marion Hepburn! and what masks and costumes the people wore to keep up the illusion! Morality and religion—these are the masks some people wear to give their lives the appearance of respectability, to help them seem sincere and upright. But what corruption exists under these gaudy masks! This is the farce which enlightened minds must contemplate!

One day, during the sixth month after her dismissal, a letter was brought to her by the landlady.

"Perhaps," she kindly said, in handing Marion the letter, "this contains news of a position for you."

"Perhaps," was the echoed answer. "Perhaps. I'm getting so tired of looking for work. I despair of ever finding work. It's a game of hide and go seek. Sometimes I see a chance for work. I go after it, and then I see it no more—it's gone—and on I go from day to day, dodging here and there, fancying by a little more energy I'll find work. Its very kind of you to bring this letter up."

"Oh, no. You must not despair. You will have a place very shortly. Wait and have patience."

"I've waited," she replied, energetically, and then paused for a moment before proceeding. "Don't you think some people are better dead, than living?"

The question was uttered slowly and in a quiet voice.

"No; every person should try to make the best of this life. Its the only one they have."

"Undoubtedly." And she laughed. She did not know why, and, for a few moments, she gazed in an embarrassed manner at the envelope in her hand.

When the landlady departed she tore open the letter and read:

MY DEAR MARION: I write to ask your pardon for my conduct toward you the day I dismissed you. I have thought over what you said, and have come to the conclusion that it is well the children should not be taught anything upon the subject of religion. When they grow older, then they can judge for themselves. I shall be glad of your services again, and, as I intend to study the question for myself, shall be glad of your assistance. Write me as soon as possible and let me know what you intend to do. All of us hope you are well. Believe me,

Sincerely yours,
MARGARET FULLER.

How glad she was! The look of despair, of gloom, was banished from her face; and the unexpected letter almost caused tears of joy to flow down her cheeks.

On went her hat and coat, and soon she was standing at the door of her late employer's residence, ringing the bell rather hurriedly for a quiet looking young lady.

"I'm so sorry I was so bigoted with you," were almost the first words that greeted her.

Everyone was glad to see her again. The children were in a state of ecstasy, the lady was smiling as if perfectly contented, while Marion was in a cloud of bewilderment.

"You will not teach anymore," Mrs. Fuller said later on. "I want you for a companion, to guide me over the shoals of faith and creed into the pure, sparkling, crystal ocean of thought and enlightenment."

That day Marion Hepburn's troubles ceased. But the knowledge she had gained of the world had cooled her enthusiasm and made her wiser. Now, there was no thoughtful world, no enlightened and tolerant people, as she once thought in the quietude of her study. What work there was to be done! What knowledge to be disseminated! The thousands of people to be educated, and brought out of the captivity of superstition! How long will the human race remain the slaves of their imagination? How long will people oppose their own progress and the advancement of civilization?

Perhaps there are some who may say Marion Hepburn should have held her peace on religion and hid her unbelief. All I can say here is: Sincerity is the reflection of a true and noble soul, and no person is sincere who cannot uphold and proclaim his opinions before an opposing world. It is better, and the only trouble is it is so easily said, that one had better die for what he believes the truth, for the liberty of thought, than to go through life a fawning, cringing coward, and to have his individuality, his love for truth, crushed into fragments and lost forever.

EDWARD DOBSON.

Correspondence.

NEWBURGH, N. Y., Feb. 22, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Having a little leisure, and feeling the pangs of conscience for not having taken the matter up before, I have gone carefully over the several letters written by the young people who responded to my offer of last spring, and selected that definition of the word "God" which I consider as best fulfilling the terms of the little prize offer.

I think on the whole that what is said on the subject by Miss Clara M. Fry, of Bentonville, Ark., comes closest. She writes, "The good that one professes, the consciousness that tells one to do right. . . . All nature is God."

This latter clause has a hint of pantheism, and only as a hint it is well enough. Unfortunately there is not, and never has been, a consciousness to tell us right; that comes from experience and civilization and the slow increments of science.

The definition is as defective as a creed, but as a creed, to them who honestly hold and keep it, suffices for a guide. So I find in what this little girl (or perhaps I should say young lady) has written a real and genuine vitality.

The more elaborate thesis of Miss Emma Stockinger deserves high praise, as does also the charming letter of Miss Estella Weaver. Indeed, all of the replies printed show minds of no ordinary sort, and I think it no less than fair to mention each name: Bessie Shaffer, Philadelphia, Pa.; Mary L. Livengood; William Beckler, Escondido, Cal.; Geo. H. Gibson, Northville, Mich.; A. E. Benoit, Marsh, Idaho; Lucy W. Phelps, West Sutton, Mass.

If you will drop me a line to say that I am doing right, I will send Miss Fry the promised copy of "Inquendo Island."

In the beginning, when we first talked over this little contest, you yourself wrote that you did not "quite see how a myth (fable) could be nearer the truth than a fact." And furthermore, I received a courteous and kindly challenge (as to a "philosopher with back action surprises lurking in his sentences" as he frolicked with the children) to give my own definition of what the word God should mean to the future Freethinker.

I think it my duty to reply to these queries or challenges, and to make my reply as brief and free from ambiguity or "back action surprises" as possible.

In the first place, a myth is radically different from a fable; a fable is a falsehood told in illustration of truth; a myth is the consensus evolved—not made—of the ideals of an epoch. It—like a creed in a limited way—is an expression for the universal feeling of a status of civilization.

A fact is a fact, and nothing can be truer than a fact; but when you have a quantity of facts and undertake to get their full significance, especially if they change positions, as they do in this world, rapidly, then the myth comes in very handy to give coherence to the whole.

The myth, in one word, is art, as an artistic painting or drawing of a horse in action gives a much better idea of the true facts than any number of instantaneous photographs.

The ancient mythologies personified adjectives—the qualities of the universal. The Hebrew monotheistic myth personified the noun—a supreme being—a name for the coordination of qualities.

The Christian myth, retaining properly the God-name, the crude monochrome of Moses, touched the picture with the warm colors of the truest and tenderest emotion.

The salient features of this myth, what some call the "plan of salvation," are a personification of the implacable consequences of nature in an "angry God," and of the beneficent results of self-sacrifice in the vicarious atonement of Jesus.

Science gives us algebraic symbols for the conic sections. The Christian myth is an expression for the curve of beauty, of living, a curve not to be expressed in an equation, but felt in (what we call) the heart.

This region of thought called of religion is capable of being regarded as scientific equally with all other sciences. We never doubt the existence of mathematics as an entity (without body, parts, or passions) "revealed" in the mathematician. It is the same with all other faculties, for every one a corresponding universal principle.

Why should the principle fail with principle itself? Why should our consciousness fail to recognize the universal or infinitesimal consciousness?

God is all nature, as Miss Fry says, or as we ourselves are limited individualities personified, so God is limitless principle personified.

When we understand, as we certainly do not now, the nature of our own personality, then perhaps we shall know intellectually what may be felt certainly, the divine personality.

The cardinal principles of the science of religion, the philosophy of certainty, are few and simple. There is no such thing as the supernatural; but there is manifestation and principle, the seen and the unseen, the temporal, associated always with matter, and the eternal, independent of matter.

It is possible to eradicate entirely all superstition, and yet to retain veneration, to give up faith in phantoms for a nobler faith in evidence. Causality the reasoner is diviner than credulity the follower, because the results he gives are truer.

What one may achieve all may achieve. I make no claim to be a philosopher, but after all the best results are of the heart in spirit and not in the letter, which infallibly come to those who follow the light of truth, either knowing the truth—having added to faith in it knowledge of it, or confiding in it like a little child.

If anyone should care to pursue this subject in greater detail, it might be well to read a series of articles which are now appearing in the Open Court, and also an essay entitled "The Brain's Glebe," which will appear in the Metaphysical Magazine, published at 503 Fifth Avenue, New York, probably in the April number.

Faithfully yours, HUDOR GENONE.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. . . . Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

THE BETTER WORLD. By E. B. Southwick. M.D. New York Truth Seeker Co.; pp. 375. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1. The author of this interesting book describes an imaginary community where selfishness, avarice, and fear are not known, that is far advanced in all the sciences and where all are free and equal, and all enjoy the same privileges and the same rights. People who work together, play together, study together, and discuss all subjects together, and what one learns he imparts to all the others as far as possible. A community that has no doctors, no lawyers, no preachers, no professors, and by observing a strictly scientific diet and having the proper exercise are never sick. As they always do right they need no courts of justice, no laws for criminals and malefactors, and need very little political government. This book is very suggestive of the good time coming when Freethought shall have done its perfect work.—Freethought Magazine.

This number of THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL (the first, we are told, which has been issued for four years) contains the usual calendar, each month being accompanied by some lines from the pen of Mr. Macdonald. This is followed by a valuable 24-page resume of the progress of Freethought in the United States during the past four years. The rest of the 128 pages is occupied by articles from the pens of some of the most prominent Freethought writers, one of which, by Colonel Ingersoll, we reprinted last week. We hope the ANNUAL will have a large sale. We looked for a list or Directory of Freethought and Liberal Societies in Canada and the States, and hope it will be supplied in a future issue. Price, 25 cents.—Secular Thought.

[If our Canadian contemporary will look on page 127 of the ANNUAL he will find a list of societies and lecturers.]

Several thousand copies have been sold by the Truth Seeker Company of its recent book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," by Samuel P. Putnam. It is an exhaustive and striking showing of the work that has been done by men of advanced thought from the earliest times to the present. Colonel Ingersoll is among those who have commended it. Even such readers as are slow to sympathize with advanced thinking will be impressed by the record here made, while those who welcome the most liberal discussion will find it a perfect storehouse or mine of information.—New York Times.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL FOR 1895 is full of interest. There is an admirable account of Freethought in the United States; a brief but pithy paper on "The Old and the New," by Colonel Ingersoll; "What the Church has Not Done for Women," by Mrs. Gage; "What are Women Here For?" by Miss Helen Gardner; "A Queer God and His Queer Book," by John Peck; "The Education of Children," by Susan Wixon; "Secular Sunday-Schools," by Katie Kehm Smith, and other articles, together with much useful information to American Freethinkers. Nor must we forget the amusing sketch of "The One-Horned Ox" by George E. Macdonald, who has an original fund of bright American humor. We hope THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL will have a wide circulation, for it should be enjoyed wherever it goes.—Freethinker.

A TALE OF A HALO. By Morgan A. Robertson. Illustrated by A. Carey K. Jurist. The Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette Place, New York.

This charming little book consists of 70 pages of verse printed on highly-toned paper. It opens with a neatly-executed frontispiece, depicting a scene in Hades, where—

The Archangel Michael had flown down below,
On a tour of inspection in Hell, and a flame
Had singed off his wings, so downward he came To the ground, which he struck with the back of his neck
(It took twenty devils to clear up the wreck).

The writer describes in a most happy vein many imaginary conversations and conflicts between St. Peter, heaven's gate-keeper, and Michael, and these are comically illustrated with marginal sketches. Both author and artist have done their work admirably in this pretty publication.—Freethinker.

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

breaks no bones and probably few hearts, though it would once have entitled its author to broken bones wherever racks were in fashion. It relates the incidents of a visit by Beelzebub to heaven on a mission from Satan and plays havoc with most of the traditions about those persons and that place. The satire is not without cleverness and were it on less touchy subjects would make general merriment; but most people who have friends that believe in heaven and the saints do not relish having them made fun of. COLUMBIAS FOR 1895.

A Highly Artistic Catalogue Sets Forth the Merits of these Famous Bicycles.

Noted artists occasionally condescend to lend their aid to make a trade catalogue beautiful, and this has evidently been the case with the new handbook of Columbia bicycles, just issued. From the rich and striking cover to the last of the dainty sketches that adorn the broad margins, the tell-tale marks that show the hand of well-known contributors to Life, Vogue, and the leading magazines are everywhere apparent. The idea skillfully carried out in the illustrations is that of sport and travel. The book will long be preserved as one of the handsomest art works of the year. It is as little like the ordinary trade catalogue as well can be, and yet it cleverly tells of the merits of Columbia bicycles for 1895, and also of lower-priced machines, Hartfords. No lover of bicycling or of beautiful books should neglect sending for the Columbia Catalogue. It can be had by calling upon Columbia agents, or it will be sent by mail for two 2-cent stamps. Gems of Thought.

ALL free government is based upon free discussion.—Washington Gladden.

THE history of intellectual progress is written in the lives of Infidels. Political rights have been preserved by traitors; the liberty of mind by heretics.—Ingersoll.

HEROISM is the avowal of the unschooled man that he finds a quality in him that is negligent of expense, of health, of life, of danger, of hatred, of reproach, and knows that his will is higher and more excellent than all actual and all possible antagonists.—R. W. Emerson.

It is so unfortunate that the rules of war cannot be changed so that the men who lead in declaring and making war can be forced to lead in desperate charges and murderous battles. To make this change would be to take a long stride on the line of justice and peace.—Galveston News.

No doubt, under different circumstances, Voltaire would have fought differently. But he would never have thought of treating atrocities without indignation, or absurdities without ridicule. Gravity is a part of the game of imposture, and there is nothing the hypocrites and humbugs resent more than having their solemn pretenses laughed at.—J. M. Wheeler.

We have made it the business of life to die, long enough. Now let us make it the business of life to live. Instead of those words of delusion and superstition, "In God we trust," let us rather write upon our standards these, Self-reliance! Courage! Forward! and advance to the achievement of a felicity in this life transcending the wildest dreams of the devotees' impossible heavens.—John Francis Smith.

It is important that freedom of transmission and interchange of ideas should be defended. Education without freedom is food without salt. Education is comparison. If comparison is under ban education barely escapes with its life. Our civilization is slow to learn that it is unsafe for society to drive evil into hiding places. Face the dangers. Bravely meet and use or discredit all offers of social benefit.—Horace L. Traubel.

INCONVENIENCE, suffering, and death are the penalties attached to ignorance, as well as to incompetence—are also the means of remedying these. Partly by weeding out those of lowest development, and partly by subjecting those who remain to the never-ceasing discipline of experience, Nature secures the growth of a race of men who shall both understand the conditions of existence, and be able to act up to them.—Herbert Spencer.

NONE knew more clearly than he [Whitman] did how completely our people were under the illusion of the genteel and the conventional, and that among even the emancipated few the possession of anything like robust esthetic perception was rare enough. America, so bold and original and independent in the world of practical politics and material endeavor, is, in spiritual and imaginative regions, timid, conforming, imitative.—John Burroughs.

GOETHE, being once in Kiel, was invited to attend a meeting, called by some clergymen, for the suppression of obscene literature. He attended, and proposed that they should begin with the Bible. That ended the conference, and it was never heard of again. And that will end all these attempts to suppress books called immoral by prurient imaginations, just so soon as the same measure is meted out to Freethinkers and Bible societies.—Moncure D. Conway.

BROADLY, it may be said, there are two educational systems, the difference between which is as fundamental and vital as the difference between despotism and democracy. The one, at the heart of which is the medieval or monarchical idea, rests upon force and works by coercion, repulsion, suspicion, and depression; the other rests upon mutual sympathy, and works by coöperation, attraction, confidence, and enthusiasm. The characteristic process of the one is from without in, the characteristic process of the other is from within out. The one is paternal, the other fraternal. The chief thought in the paternal system is knowledge; the chief thought in the fraternal system is character. That holds fast to custom and tradition; this follows after truth and inspiration. As to their ultimate results, the paternal system dismisses the child from school with the notion that his education is "finished," and with slight inclination or ability to carry on his studies independently; while the fraternal system dismisses him with the idea that his education is just begun, and with both the desire and the power to continue his intellectual pursuits to the end of life.—Edwin S. Sheppe.

PIANOS! PIANOS!

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominations Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

THE Rev. Rosy Babbleton: "Heaven is a place where the wicked will cease from troubling." Fan De Seck: "I know; but will the good continue to bore one there?"—Oakland Echoes.

THE Bishop of Lyons being at a sumptuous breakfast, the Abbé de Prades paid him a visit. The bishop invited him to partake of some chicken and ham. The abbé declined, and the prelate insisted. "My lord," said the abbé, "I have breakfasted twice already; and, besides, this is a fast day."

AN old woman was praising, in rather enthusiastic terms, the sermons of a Scotch minister, who had acquired a great name for depth and sublimity. The suspicions of her auditor were a little roused, and she ventured to propose a question to her: "Well, Jenny, do you understand him?" "Understand him!" ejaculated Jenny, holding up her hands in astonishment at the question; "me understand him! Wad I hae the presumption?"

WHEN it comes to getting at the root of things, the Rev. De Witt Talmage is right on hand. He has estimated the dimensions of heaven, measured the whale which Jonah inhabited, and figured out Solomon's estate to have been worth $191,538,006,032. Now, if T. De W. T. will give us the length of the snake which caused that fall in apples, the kind of fuel used in the fiery furnace, and what system of ventilating was used in the ark, it will be time for him to take up another contribution for the tabernacle fund.—Arkansas Traveler.

A SHORT time ago we related the story of a negro preacher who had designed a thrilling incident for his Advent sermon. As he described "the Holy Ghost descending like a dove," a veritable pigeon was to be lowered by his assistant through a hole in the ceiling. When the time came, however, and after the preacher had twice repeated the words, "the Holy Ghost descended like a dove," not the dove, but the woolly head of the assistant appeared, who announced, in loud and disgusted tones, that "de Holy Ghost can't come down to-day, massa, 'case de old black cat's bin up yer and chawed his d—d head off."

"Ah," said the Pastor to the Delinquent Church Member, "I notice you do not attend the sanctuary service as you once did. I greatly fear, my brother, that your piety is on the wane." "Oh, no," replied the Delinquent Church Member, "my piety continues about the same, but my doctor tells me that the air that remains stagnant in the church building the entire week is conducive to pulmonary diseases." "But our church, brother, is thoroughly ventilated." "Yes; but my doctor tells me that a common communion cup is very dangerous, and is sure to spread all kinds of contagious diseases." "But at any rate, you might come and hear the sermon." "Yes, but my doctor says it is very dangerous to sleep in a draught."—New York World.

"ALL who want to go to heaven," said the minister, "will please stand up." Apparently the whole congregation stood up. "Please sit down. All who don't want to go to heaven will now stand up." One man rose to his feet. Leaning forward and pointing his finger at him the good pastor spoke in tones quivering with intense feeling: "There is one person in this vast audience, I am sorry to say—and yet only one, I rejoice to say—who does not want to go to heaven! Do you know, sir," he continued, addressing the standing figure in slow, impressive manner, "that you have placed yourself in an attitude of defiance to the heavenly powers? Do you know you have made a jest and mockery of sacred things and under the thin disguise of independence have outraged the feelings of friends and neighbors who would be glad to regard you as a brother?" "Yes, sir," replied the man meekly. "I'll sit down if you will."—Chicago Tribune.

"GID" MANDEVILLE was washing some beer glasses behind the bar of the "Hotel Lindenwald" one Saturday evening, when Pete Cole, a colored gentleman, with a singular protuberance resembling a tumor in the vicinity of the breast-pocket, came shuffling in. Pete leaned up against the counter, and reduced the swelling by pulling a bottle out of his pocket by a sort of eel-skinning process, as the lining came with it. It was a close fit. "What do you want, Pete?" asked "Gid," wiping the bar. "Some 'freshments fo' Sunday, boss. I ain't got de 'brads' now, but I—I'll pay you Monday mornin', shuah." "Gid" reflected a moment, looked at the bottle, set it down on the bar, took a chew of tobacco, and then glared at the colored man with a fiery eye. "See here, Pete, do you pass the plate in church to-morrow?" "I does, boss; every Sunday. I've been deacon dar since las' fall." "All right, then," said "Gid" tilting a demijohn, and pouring out the whisky, "I'll trust you this time."

Dr. Fellows is a staunch LIBERAL and a very successful physician. He has treated DISEASES OF MEN for twenty years, and his remedies are an outgrowth of this long practice, which should give confidence to those afflicted

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven Catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address, F. J. SOME SUGGESTIONS TO HIS INFALLIBILITY.

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

Free Thought and Free Expression.

An English paper observes that "Freethinker" is a redundancy. All thought is free; what is, occasionally, not free is the expression of a thought which impugns or endangers authority." This is illogical and misleading. As to deny the means to an end is to forbid the end, so to deny the expression of thought is to forbid thought in effect, if not in terms. Practically, there is no difference between prohibiting thought and the expression of thought. The only reason despots do not make their repressive laws in terms operative against heretical or rebellious thoughts is because they have no means of cognizing thoughts save through the expression thereof. They reach the results at which they aim by preventing free expression. Thought is no longer free when its instrument, expression, is in chains. The long-continued disuse of an organ inevitably weakens the working capacity of that organ. Use brightens, quickens, and sharpens the brain, and augments its power; that is, freedom of expression stimulates the mental faculties, increases their range, gives them greater liberty because greater strength. The nation whose people are denied the liberty to say what they wish to say gradually but surely deteriorates mentally, and freedom of thought becomes merely a figure of speech. If it were possible to at all times prevent the expression of thought the brain, the organ of thought, would become atrophied and we should return to the simian. The freedom of thought is in direct ratio to the freedom of expression. There is no better word to express our demand that men shall be free to investigate in all departments of human activity and knowledge than this, Freethought, and no more appropriate name for the friend of mental liberty than this, Freethinker. When it is said that "occasionally" the freedom of expression is denied, we are forced to add that not one adult person in each one hundred in Christian lands feels free to express himself or herself on all subjects, for law or church or custom or Mrs. Grundy stands ready to crush out new or unconventional opinions. And, of course, its expression being thus forbidden, thought is not free, cannot be free.

The Approaching Trial of J. B. Wise.

The case of J. B. Wise, accused of a violation of the United States statutes against the transmission of obscene and indecent literature in the mails, was adjourned to the April term of the federal court. The time is almost here when an American citizen is to be put in jeopardy of his liberty for the exercise of his right to do what all Christians claim the right to do, that is, assist in the circulation of the "word of God." It is astonishing that the ponderous machinery of the national courts should be set in operation to crush a man whose only offense is that he faithfully transcribed a passage from the book which is declared to be from the hand of God and necessary to the salvation of the souls of all people, and mailed that transcription to an official expounder of that book. It is an outrage that any man should be punished by the agencies that are established ostensibly for the protection of the innocent because he has ventured to ask a minister to explain the presence in the alleged divine moral guide of a passage which he deems inconsistent with the claims made for that guide. This is the exact measure of the "crime" charged against Mr. J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kansas. There is no one who can have the hardihood to assert that the mail bags or the postal cars were damaged by the presence therein of a text quoted from the Bible; it would be preposterous to asseverate that the clerks on the cars or those in the receiving and distributing post-offices were harmed by the passage through their hands of the card written by the one-armed Freethinker of Clay county, while it would be the height of absurdity to assume that the "minister of God" was injured by having his attention called to the fact that the "word of God," to the exposition of which his life is devoted, contains a certain text. That portion of the scriptures must have been perfectly familiar to Rev. Mr. Vennum years before he got into that discussion with Mr. Wise; no doubt he had read it hundreds of times. As legal punishments are inflicted to protect individuals from injury in their property and persons, and as it is perfectly clear that the act for which Mr. Wise is arraigned could not possibly have injured any man, woman, or child, it is indubitable that the prosecution of him is simply persecution, for which, of course, there is the excuse of bigotry and ignorance only.

Below we reprint the indictment found against Mr. Wise by the federal grand jury last April. We omit the text of Isaiah xxxvi, 12, because, as the attack upon Mr. Wise shows, freedom of speech and press is not yet safe in this country:

"The United States of America, District of Kansas, ss.

"In the District Court of the said United States, in and for the First Division of the said District, April Term, 1894.

"The United States of America vs. J. B. Wise. Indictment for Violation of Section 3893, Revised Statutes of the United States.

"At the Term of the District Court of the United States of America, in and for the First Division of said District of Kansas, begun and held at Topeka, in the First Division of said District, on the ninth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, the Grand Jurors of the United States of America, duly impaneled, sworn and charged to inquire of offenses committed within the First Division of the District of Kansas, upon their oaths do find and present, that J. B. Wise (whose more full Christian name is to the Grand Jurors aforesaid unknown), late of the First Division of the District of Kansas aforesaid, on or about the 28th day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, at the first Division of the District of Kansas aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this Court, unlawfully and knowingly a certain obscene and indecent postal card did deposit, and cause to be deposited for mailing, and delivery to Reverend H. B. Vennum, at Industry, Clay County, Kansas, on the back of which said postal card was written the words: 'Rev. H. B. Vennum, Industry, Clay Co., Kan.,' which said obscene and indecent postal card was by the said J. B. Wise knowingly deposited and caused to be deposited in the post-office of the United States at Clay Center, Kansas, within said First Division of the District of Kansas, to be conveyed by mail, and by the use of said post-office and its officers to said Reverend H. B. Vennum, at Industry, Clay County, Kansas, and upon which said obscene and indecent postal card are the following obscene and indecent words, writing, and figures to wit: . . . He, the said J. B. Wise, then and there well knowing that said obscene and indecent postal card was non-mailable matter, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America.

"MORRIS OLIGGITT.

"Assistant United States Attorney.

"United States of America, District of Kansas, ss.

"I, Geo. F. Sharitt, Clerk of the District Court of the United States of America for the District of Kansas, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true, and perfect copy of the indictment in case of The United States vs. J. B. Wise. No. 3197 in said Court.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said Court, at my office in Topeka, in said District of Kansas, this 8th day of March A.D. 1895. GEO. F. SHARITT, Clerk."

In this connection it must be said that the Fund for the defense of Mr. Wise is many times less than the amount of expenses of the preliminary proceedings and trial, and we are compelled to again urge upon the Freethinkers of the country the necessity of joining in the defense of citizens' right to quote from the Bible at their discretion when criticising it or instituting comparisons between it and other literature. We have equal rights with Bible worshipers and must, if need be, fight with all legitimate weapons at our command for the undisturbed enjoyment of those rights. The mails must be freed from the existing censorship and the adjudication of wrongs be remanded to courts in the vicinage of the offender or alleged offender. The federal government has no call to inquire into the ethical or religious character of the matter which it is paid to carry from point to point. Mr. Wise has done no wrong, and we but defend ourselves when we aid him to vindicate his innocence.

Mr. Gladstone on "The Lord's Day."

In McClure's Magazine for March we find an article from the pen of William E. Gladstone on "The Lord's Day." It is not openly a plea for a legally enforced observance of the first day of the week, but we surmise that the argument is intended to strengthen the hands of the compulsory Sabbatarians, by demonstrating that Jesus and the early church, in substituting Sunday for Saturday, did not violate the fundamental principle underlying the Sabbatic idea; that, rather, the change was in complete harmony with that principle, and was manifestly in God's thought when he instituted the "original" Sabbath. Of course Mr. Gladstone does not distinctly say all this—the essay would not be Gladstonian if he did—but the conclusions we have drawn are fairly inferable from what he does say.

Mr. Gladstone's contribution is of no value whatever to anyone who has made a careful study of the Sabbath question. He utterly ignores all that relates to the natural origin of the week and of Sabbaths; except for his quotations from Cruden and the Latin of St. Augustin his performance could be duplicated by any itinerant minister who can write fair English. One gets no hint from his labored disquisition of the lunar origin of the week; no hint of the fact that any people but the Israelites had a Sabbath; no hint that the week has been of various lengths in different countries and that the Sabbath has fallen on different days; no hint that the Jewish Sabbath was at first a moon festival, and that the Israelites in all probability borrowed both their week and their Sabbath from the Babylonian Assyrians during the captivity, and no hint that we received our week and our Sabbath from the same source through Egypt and Rome. He calmly assumes the truth of the story of the creation, the fall of man, and the sacrifice and resurrection of a third part of the godhead. In brief, he has learned nothing from the records of travel and research among primitive and savage peoples, nothing from science, nothing from the studies of the philologists and the Biblical critics, nothing from the revelations of the modern historians who have sifted the ancient chronicles, separating the grains of not inherently improbable narrative from the chaff of myth and miracle. Is it to be wondered at that his article is barren of rich thought and fertilizing suggestion?

The ex-Premier of England observes that many of the defenders of the Sabbath—or of the “Lord’s Day,” as he prefers to designate it—“put wholly out of view the revealed sanction and the properly Christian motive,” while he is sorry that “very many of those defenders whose motive and profession are not secular, but distinctly religious, are singularly ill-equipped with consistent or perspicuous ideas of the subject.” We regret that if these latter carefully peruse Mr. Gladstone’s article they will be foggier in their ideas than they were before. He also observes that they do not live up to their professions, for they devote a great portion of the sacred day, “if not to secular occupations and amusements, yet to secular thought and conversation.” It is not charged that this is done “with deliberate or conscious insincerity; yet we must all feel when the margin between profession and practice has become, and is allowed to remain, enormous, real insincerity lies perilously near.” This is one of the inevitable results of the attempt to force others to do an unnatural act which we feel no imperative inner prompting to do ourselves. As to the secular reasons for Sunday observance, Mr. Gladstone thinks favorably of the “rest” notion, and remarks that it has probably “greatly helped the continuance of Sabbath legislation,” has, in fact, contributed to the increase of its stringency. He is of the opinion that the most devout believers in the “Christian character and obligation of the day,” may “thankfully avail themselves of the aid derived from alliance with this secondary but salutary sentiment.” Or, in other and plainer words, the delusion that Sunday laws are needed to secure the secondary and minor good of rest may be gratefully utilized to secure the primary and major good of increased church attendance. The laborer is to be fooled into permitting himself to be used as a cat’s paw to pull Theology’s hot chestnuts out of the fire—chestnuts in a double sense.

We are informed that, in England at least, there is not, in the general mind, any conception, “at once accurate and clear, of the religious ground on which we are to observe the Sunday.” We sincerely pity the believer who reads this attempt of Mr. Gladstone to clarify the hazy conceptions of his countrymen and other Sabbatarians. “Hazy” is Mr. Gladstone’s own word; he says that there is “a hazy, but still practical and by no means superficial, impression that in some way or other it [Sunday observance] has to do with the original command delivered through Moses.” Which means that men may be fined and imprisoned for disregard of Sunday laws that a part of the religious portion of the community have an impression, hazy at that, are in some occult way connected with a statute said to have been given by a god for the governance of some ancient tribes on an entirely different day. Into this old statute two important changes have been imported, says Mr. Gladstone; its form has been altered by the transference of the commandment from the seventh to the first day of the week, and to its spirit has been imparted a “positive and affirmative, in addition to its originally negative and prohibitory, sense.” It is admitted that the old signification has been relaxed, although the church and the state of England have kept it in full view, “but the ascent that the fourth commandment of the Decalogue has made [think of the “ascent” of the omnipotent god’s infallible edicts!] and the development and expansion that it has received under the Christian dispensation have not so prominently been put forward.” Hence it is concluded that the Christian world has but imperfectly grasped what is meant by observance of Sunday. Mr. Gladstone cautiously suggests that there may have been “a concurring cause for this in the indisposition of many minds, after the crisis of the Reformation, to recognize any action of the church apart from scripture.” This is merely an indirect way of saying that Protestants were averse to accepting a holy day on the authority of the Catholic church. “It is difficult, in a tranquil survey of the whole case, to exclude from it some admission of such action,” that is, some admission that Sunday was selected by the Catholic church in place of Saturday on its own authority alone. However, our apologist, evidently satisfied in his own mind that if the Christian world is to have any Sabbath it must make a virtue of necessity and take that of Rome, says that the change “has been in obvious furtherance of the mind of the Bible,” and that it may be regarded “as expressing the harmonious co-operation of the entire Christian community.”

Mr. Gladstone frankly concedes that there is no positive or direct precept of the Bible which authorizes the substitution of Sunday for Saturday, and that “the Biblical record of facts” upon which he relies for proof of the validity of the transfer is “all supplied by St. John.” What are the “facts” thus recorded by this one gospel, and it, admittedly, the latest? It is alleged that it was the custom of the Apostles to meet for worship on “the Lord’s Day,” that is, Sunday. How inadequate this evidence of John is to establish the contention that the Apostles meant to make Sunday the Sabbath of the “New Dispensation” any one who will take the trouble to read Mr. Remsburg’s “Sabbath Breaking” will at once perceive. It was not until near the beginning of the third century that Sunday was called the “Lord’s Day.” Mr. Gladstone says that “the Christian community took it upon itself to alter the form of the Jewish ordinance, but this was with a view of giving larger effect to its spiritual purpose.” This is nonsense, and is contradicted by all the ascertainable facts. Constantine ordered the observance of Sunday because he could easily adapt the pagan festival to Christian uses, but would have found it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to compel the Roman converts to adopt the Jewish Sabbath. The “Christian community” of which Mr. Gladstone speaks was not the Christian community that actually made the change, as he should well know. And, unless he is prepared to concede that the Catholic church is indeed the only church founded by Jesus, the son, and by him commissioned to execute his commands, where did the “Christian community” get the authority to alter the edict of God, the father? Mr. Gladstone undoubtedly saw the dilemma that he was in, for, after he had quoted some very inconclusive passages from John to bolster up his trembling column of argument, he was forced to admit that, after all, the aggregate of evidence he had adduced was “not literally homogeneous,” but he tried to comfort himself and assure his readers with the dogged assertion that it was conclusive. To show the extreme weightiness of the reasoning of the “Grand Old Man” we subjoin this passage:

“The seventh day had been ordained as the most appropriate, according to the Decalogue, for commemorating the old creation. The advent of our Lord introduced to us a chain of events, by which alone the benefits of the creation were secured to us, together with the yet higher benefits of the new. The series of these events culminated in the resurrection. With the resurrection began for the savior himself a rest from all that was painful in the process of redemption, as on the seventh day there had begun a rest from the constructive labors that had brought the visible world into existence and maturity.”

Every assertion in the above is either the repetition of or a deduction from an utterly unprovable myth-story. Mr. Gladstone has introduced as evidence the identical tales which are themselves in dispute. The entire argument is therefore utterly valueless. It should be noted in passing that he has ignored the reason given in Deuteronomy for the establishment of the Sabbath, viz., that it was in commemoration of the return of the Jews from captivity. It might also be pertinent to ask the parliamentary leader if he thinks that there is nothing painful to Jesus in that part of the “process of redemption” which he is now undergoing, according to the legend, as he sits at the right hand of God and intercedes for the sons of men, realizing, as he must every instant, that only the smallest minority of the human race are to be saved by his sacrifice, while the great majority must suffer the agonies of the damned forever? Would this lamentable failure of his mission bring no pain to the heart of the being whom Mr. Gladstone worships as the incarnation of mercy and love?

We commend to the attention of W. E. Gladstone, the devout Christian, this summing-up of the Saturday-Sunday question, made by Rev. J. N. Waggoner:

“1. There is no divine command for Sunday observance. 2. There is not the least hint of a Sunday institution. 3. Christ never changed God’s Sabbath to Sunday. 4. He never observed Sunday as the Sabbath. 5. The apostles never kept Sunday for the Sabbath. 6. There is no prophecy that Sunday would ever take the place of the Sabbath. 7. Neither God, Christ, angels, nor inspired men have ever said one word in favor of Sunday as a holy day.”

Sabbatarianism Rampant.

It is indisputable that the advocates of restrictive Sabbath legislation are engaged in a concerted movement all over the country to enforce the present Sabbath laws and secure the enactment of new and more sweeping and severe statutes. We have from week to week called attention to the encroachments of the clerical party, but the aggressions continue to increase so rapidly that we are forced to omit proper mention of many of which the Free-thinkers of the United States should be informed. Here is a bill introduced in the Minnesota legislature by Senator Theden:

“A Bill for an Act to Prohibit Public Shows or Exhibitions on the Sabbath Day, and Defining and Fixing the Penalty thereof.

“SECTION 1. Whoever, on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, participates in or exhibits to the public, with or without charge for admission, in any building, room, ground, garden, or other place in this state, any theatrical or dramatic performance of any kind or description, or any equestrian or circus performance of jugglers, acrobats, rope-dancing, sparring exhibitions, variety shows, or negro minstrelsy, living statuary, ballooning or any baseball playing, or other games of similar kind or kinds, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine in a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars nor less than fifty dollars, or by confinement in a county jail for a period not less than twenty days nor exceeding sixty days.”

A correspondent of the American Sentinel, commenting on this bill, asks, “Why such a bill? Evidently, the people ought to go to church, but they will not; so in order that they may be persuaded to go, remove all temptation. But when it is found that they will not then go to church, secure a law compelling them to go! This is but the logical result of the first step.” That is no doubt the exact statement of the case, from the view point of the Sabbatarian, and we may expect the last step to be essayed when the preceding ones fail to accomplish their purpose, that is, the filling of the churches.

In our issue of March 9th we told of the conviction of H. Stratmann, of Louisville, for violation of the Sunday law of Kentucky. This conviction has greatly encouraged the proscriptives. Heretofore the Sabbath statutes of that state have been regarded as inoperative, and the people of Louisville supposed that Judge Thompson would at once dismiss the complaint against Stratmann. But the decision he gave in the case stirred the ministers to fever heat, and they determined to make the most possible of the unexpected turn in favor of their monopolistic scheme. The topic was one of almost universal conversation, and the city officials were constrained by the logic of the situation to attempt to enforce the revived blue law. The matter was laid before the "Board of Safety," and general enforcement was ordered. The police were told not to make any arrests, but to take evidence for future use. On Monday morning there were no less than 2,500 cases ready for action. It was decided to select from these representative bakeries, saloons, groceries, and other kinds of business, and so test the law. One minister declared: "As long as we can get such righteous decisions as the one handed down by Judge Thompson, things are not altogether bad." Another said: "Judge Thompson is a fine type of a Christian on the bench." A call for a mass meeting was issued by the Kentucky Sabbath Association, and in the call the "civil Sabbath" romance was revamped for the purpose of fooling gullible people. "This meeting is called by an association that operates from a purely civil standpoint [what an abominable lie!] striving to maintain the weekly day of rest as a purely civil institution, which is a necessity for man and beast." How "civil" the meeting was may be judged from the fact that of the three hundred persons present more than half were ministers and theological students. All the ministers but one who spoke were Baptists. What would that sturdy defender of liberty, Roger Williams, have thought of his degenerate religious sons could he have listened to their intemperate clamor for the persecution of dissenters? Here are two of the benevolent resolutions adopted:

"Resolved, That we call upon our officials to see that the Sunday laws are kindly but firmly enforced, and that we will heartily support them in doing their duty.

"Resolved, That since nobody is compelled to live in this state, those persons who do not like our laws should either gracefully submit to them, or else move elsewhere, where they can find laws to suit their tastes."

Think of "kindly" enforcing religious dogmas! How "kind" the Inquisitors were too, to be sure! The cant of the persecutor is essentially the same in all ages. And if you do not like his rule you can get off the earth! If your conscience is obdurate all you have to do is to "educate it by the laws of the state;" that is, by the unconstitutional and invasive statutes he has cajoled or intimidated the legislature into enacting. As a minister said at this meeting, "if men don't propose to do as the law [the priests' law] says, we [the said priests] have the liberty to force them." And not only the liberty but the power, so long as the American people are too sleepy or cowardly to assert their rights.

At Springdale, Ark., not long ago, two Seventh Day Adventist elders were arrested for Sunday work; one for painting his church. What a "disturbance" such noisy work must have caused! How he must have wakened the echoes in the Ozark foot hills! The other elder had outraged Arkansas piety by doing some carpenter work, out of charity, for a destitute widow. The unprincipled villain! He should have been at church, making shingles for his mansion in the New Jerusalem. Both the men were convicted, and imprisoned as common felons.

Two or three weeks ago a man named Green, at Wilmington, Del., desiring to go to church, and not wishing to appear in the "house of God" with an unshaven chin, stepped into a barber shop and was there made presentable. For his part in the transaction the unfortunate barber was presented at court and fined four dollars and costs. No doubt the preacher in the church which Mr. Green attended applauded the magistrate who punished the barber for being instrumental in increasing his congregation on that Sunday.

Judge Barker, of Johnstown, Pa., is rigidly enforcing the Sunday closing law in Cambria county. Enthusiastic Sabbath law conventions have recently been held in Newville and Apollo, Pa. The large audiences were unanimously against any modification of the Sabbath law of 1794. The New Castle convention appointed a committee to prepare a plan for the establishment of a National Reform (God-in-the-Constitution) bureau in Washington.

The National Reform convention in Boston on Feb. 19 and 20 was largely attended and culminated in the formation of a New England auxiliary. The Christian amendment to the Constitution, state and national Sabbath laws, and the control of education and marriage by the church were the chief "reforms" advocated.

A mass Sabbath meeting was held in the Music Hall, Boston, on March 10. It was under the auspices of the Massachusetts Sunday Protective League and the Evangelistic Association of New England. Of course the latter was interested in a "civil" Sabbath only! Rev. Dr. M. D. Kneeland, secretary of the League, claimed that, to the efforts of that association was due the Sunday closing of the World's Fair. The League had likewise done excellent service in the abolition of Sunday excursion trains at Boston. Yes, it is such a glorious service to humanity to shut the poor people of a great city up in their narrow homes on their only days of leisure. What a wicked defiance of God it would be for them to go out to the sea shore on the hot summer Sundays or to the restful shades of the Lynn Great Woods! The Priest is the enemy of mankind, the untiring promoter of the worst kind of immorality—the violation of the laws of physical health—the cruel torturer of the people. Of course Secretary Kneeland was bitter in his denunciations of the regular Sunday train, of the Sunday newspaper, and the Sunday evening concert. They all interfere with the business of the church. Naturally Rev. Dr. Ezra H. Byington easily disposed of the objections that the suppression of the Sunday theater would be a return to the blue laws and that it would be an interference with local self-government. You can dispose of anything if there is no one to oppose you.

Governor Greenhalge was one of the star speakers at this Sabbath meeting. He was very confused in his ideas and in his language, but managed to show that he was sensible of the fact that in coming to the city on a Sunday train he had brought himself into conflict with the extreme demands of the clerical managers of the Sabbatarian movement. But he was politician and bigot enough to utter, among other precious bits of wisdom, these two:

"Massachusetts, kneeling upon the desolate sea shore two and a half centuries ago, heard the thunder of this Sabbath law from Sinai, and wrote it into her statute book. There it is to-day, and, I prophesy, there it will remain forever."

"We talk about the separation of church and state, or, as I say, state and church; but, after all, the separation is only a legal one. [He means only a legal fiction, as his further remarks show.] For speaking in the name and on behalf of the commonwealth, I say that that great commonwealth comprehends as its most precious jewels every living church of Christ. So, my friends, this is a Christian commonwealth. It was held long ago that Christianity was a part of the common law, and it has been from the beginning, and will ever be a part of the government of the commonwealth of Massachusetts."

Poor old Massachusetts, with what a governor she is afflicted! By the way, is there a newspaper in the state that dares rebuke him for his official recognition of the theocratic principle? Is there a newspaper editor in the state who understands and has the courage to tell the truth about the relations of church and state?

The Leader, of Superior, Wis., will this week be the target of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps. It reported a local controversy as to whether the word God is in the United States Constitution, whereupon a correspondent at Oakland, Cal., writing over the initial "T" refers the editor to the Trinity church case, Supreme Court reports, Vol. 143, page 457, showing that the highest tribunal in the country has asserted that this is a Christian nation. The Leader thinks that if we are a Christian nation we should show conclusively that we are not a spurious brand. It is for the Corps to tell how that obiter dictum of the court came to be rendered and to point out, briefly, the salient features of the theocratic movement. The matter is fully set forth and discussed by Judge Waite and Rev. A. T. Jones in their addresses at the last Freethought Congress, and published in the pamphlet "Federation and Union," by the Freethought Federation of America. Each of the members will, no doubt, readily think of some particularly good argument to present in refutation of the claim that "This is a Christian nation." Send in your names for enrollment in the Corps. And also, please, remember that we want the earliest possible report from the legislatures when any bill affecting the Demands of Liberalism is introduced. Do not wait until the obnoxious Sunday measure is adopted or the bill for the taxation of church property is defeated. Then it is too late for us to help.

On a preceding page of this issue will be found the indictment of Mr. Wise, with the exception of the offending words from Isaiah xxxvi, 12, which we omit because there is no sense in having two trials on our hands at the same time. Since the appeal accompanying it was written we have received word through Attorney Bierck that the trial is set for about April 15, or as near thereto as suits the convenience of the court and prosecution. The time is short, and we ask the friends of free speech and equal rights to come to the aid of Mr. Wise speedily. The funds so far contributed are scant of the amount necessary to pay the expenses of the trial, and if it should be necessary to appeal the case a great deal more will be required. There is no use in letting a Freethinker go to jail for doing what the Christians do every day with impunity—indeed, they boast of the number of Bibles they circulate throughout the country. By this prosecution they have condemned their own book, but it remains for us Freethinkers to rescue from their clutches the victim they would sacrifice in doing so. We hope to have prompt and generous response to this appeal for aid for Mr. Wise.

We are very much gratified to learn from the Freethinker that Mr. G. W. Foote, president of the National Secular Society, and Mr. R. O. Smith, lessee of the premises on which the London Hall of Science is built, have won their suit for libel against certain Christians who made themselves responsible for an atrocious attack upon the management of the Hall of Science and the exercises conducted there. Damages to the amount of $150 were adjudged to the plaintiffs and the costs assessed against the defendants, making a total of about $750 which the good Christians will pay for the luxury of answering Freethought arguments with the worst kind of falsehoods.

During the past week we have received 50 cents from H. Wilbur, $1 from E. Carpenter, and $2 from F. Larrabee for the Free Sunday Fund. To help Mr. Fleckten in his fight against the Bible in the schools in Minnesota we acknowledge the receipt of 50 cents from L. Schlegel and $1 from G. R. Henderson. As will be seen, there is apparently no end to the Sabbatarian aggressions that call for vigilant guarding against by the Freethinkers of the country. The need for large quantities of enlightening literature was never more urgent than at present.

The American Sentinel says:

"Robert G. Ingersoll declares that he believes it his conscientious duty to lecture against it [the Bible] for the gate receipts minus the expenses."

Unless our Advent contemporary desires to suffer under the imputation of saying the thing that is not so, it will point out the chapter and verse where Colonel Ingersoll said anything of the kind. The editor of the Sentinel should not read John so much. It has a demoralizing influence on the mind.

Among the items in an appropriation bill recently introduced in the legislature of Maine, were these: For priest's salary, $200; for the Women's Christian Temperance Union, $1,000, and $3,000 for the Sisters of Charity in Lewiston.

A recent court decision in England gives a man a right to sue the preacher when he makes the man's wife go to church instead of staying at home and cooking his dinner.

The Cause in Oregon.

The Oregon legislature has adjourned. Our measure for the taxation of church property was defeated, killed in the House Committee; and when Hon. Clarence Cole, of Multnomah county, offered it as an amendment to the Burke bill, which was a bill providing for the assessment and collection of taxes, it was defeated again.

The Burke bill exempted the church edifice and the ground on which it stands, and the slips and pews. It passed the House and was killed in the Senate.

The Legislative Committee of the Oregon State Secular Union, consisting of Mrs. A. E. Barker, Hon. Lee Laughlin, and myself, worked just as long as there was any possibility of success, and it might not be uninteresting to you to know something of that work. We found no difficulty in getting a hearing before the Senate Committee on Assessment and Taxation quite early in the session. C. H. Woodard, of Multnomah county, was chairman of this committee, the other members being N. L. Butler, of Polk; W. H. Hobson, of Marion; A. R. Price, Umatilla, and W. W. Steiwer, Gilliam county. It is with pleasure that we say to the Secularists of Oregon that all these men were very courteous, particularly the chairman, and placed us under obligations for help in our work. Mr. Woodard expressed himself in favor of the taxation of all church property; Messrs. Hobson and Steiwer did not express themselves; Mr. Butler was in favor of taxing all but the schools (denominational), while the subject was one of which Mr. Price had never thought.

We found the House Committee, however, quite different. J. M. Long, of Multnomah, was chairman; W. E. Burke and Virgil Conn, of Multnomah; J. E. David, of Gilliam, and O. L. Patterson, of Grant county, being the other members.

There was no courtesy shown us by this committee as there was by the Senate Committee. Chairman Long was evidently "inspired" by the spirit of old St. Paul, for he treated us as though we were very presumptuous to want to take up the time of this honorable committee for such a cause as we represented. It was entirely unnecessary for Mr. Long to tell us that he is a Christian.

There were but three members present the evening appointed for the presentation of our argument before this committee, and a few minutes after our cold reception, the chairman announced that we might as well begin; that the other two members, Messrs. Burke and Patterson, would not be present; that they were going to devote the evening to pleasure. When the chairman had delivered this little speech, I said to him: "Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is treating an organization representing thousands of people with a great deal of disrespect." "Oh, no, Mrs. Smith," said Mr. Long, "I do not think they wanted to show any disrespect; perhaps they thought the matter of not much importance." I then said, "It is of so much importance that, if you will give us any encouragement at all, we will not present our argument this evening, but wait until some time when the gentlemen are at leisure." But he gave us to understand that we had best present what we had to say that evening, which we did. One member of this committee, Mr. David, expressed himself in favor of the taxation of all church property. Mr. Patterson told us it was a subject on which he would not commit himself; that he had not thought about it, etc. He acted like all of those young policy politicians who are so afraid that they will injure their political future that, for the good of their constituents, they had better be retired to private life.

To give you an idea of the impudence of this Christian chairman, I will relate only one of several similar incidents. During the course of Mrs. Barker's argument, he interrupted her by asking these questions: "Do you believe in a God? Do you believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ? Do you believe in a future life?" When Mrs. Barker had finished I again asked permission to speak, when I took occasion to inform the committee that the questions asked by the chairman were entirely out of place; that they had nothing to do with the subject in hand; that so far as the subject we were discussing was concerned, it was nobody's business whether we believed in one god or a million of them; that we were not attacking the rights of the church; that we were representing the people when we asked them to use their influence for the repeal of the laws which exempt church property from taxation. We felt confident, after having had this opportunity of testing the mental caliber of part of the committee, that the bill would meet exactly the fate it did.

Let the Secularists of Oregon not forget Hon. Clarence Cole, of Portland. He was our friend. While there were many of the senators and representatives who expressed themselves in favor of the taxation of church property, I wish at this time to mention particularly Senators W. R. King, of Baker county, and S. B. Huston, of Washington county. Both are thorough Secularists, and extended us many courtesies. All the the Populist members of the legislature were in favor of our measure.

Of course you will want to know how the expenses of the committee were paid. Only seven dollars were contributed in response to the appeal for funds for this purpose. Mrs. Barker's circuit contributed twenty dollars for her expenses. Mr. Laughlin paid his own expenses, and generously let me have the seven dollars, to which my circuit at Silverton added eight dollars more. This money would not have paid our expenses but for the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. B. Forstner, whose guests Mrs. Barker and I were during our whole stay at the capital. Our visit with these kind friends was most delightful, and we did indeed appreciate their genial hospitality. On behalf of the Oregon State Secular Union, I thank them. Mr. Laughlin, though in poor health, was untiring in his efforts for the measure. Having formerly been a member of the legislature, he was personally acquainted with many of its members, and we could not have found a more influential Secularist in the state to put on this committee than Mr. Laughlin. His courteous and dignified bearing was of itself a power in our favor.

We tried hard to get before the joint committee and the legislature in joint session, but could not.

We succeeded in having part of our argument published in the Oregon Daily Statesman, a copy of which was put on the desk of each legislator, together with a notice calling their attention to the fact that it had been published.

Though the measure for the taxation of church property was defeated, yet we are sure that the agitation has done much in the way of education. Had not the senatorial contest so greatly interfered with legislation we would have had more hope of accomplishing our object.

Secularism in Oregon is no longer in the infant stage. Politicians will learn, if they do not already know, that we are in the field to stay; and now, if the thousands of Secularists in this state will send for blanks, and identify themselves with the Union, the work at the next session of the legislature will be easier than it was at this one. When we can publish to the world that we are 40,000 strong in this state, our Union will indeed be a power. The good work will go on. This fight will prepare us for the greater battle yet to come.

KATIE KEHM SMITH,

Sec. Oregon State Secular Union.

Oregon City, Or.,

The First Honest Translation of Genesis I.

Philologists and biblical scholars agree that the Hebrew word "Elohim" is the plural of "Eloah," signifying god, or the god. In the various versions the word Elohim is erroneously translated "god," but the correct translation would be "gods," or the gods. As this false translation is common throughout the scriptures, it is a matter of the highest importance that the fallacy should be exposed, as upon the notion sought to be conveyed by the common word "god" depends the whole character of the Christian religion, the Jewish religion, and whatever other religions may have been erected upon the false translation of the fourth word in Genesis, the central idea of all biblical religions.

In his "Dictionary of the Bible" Dr. William Smith, LL.D., of the University of London, says, under the head "God":

"Throughout the Hebrew scriptures two chief names are used for the one true divine being—Elohim, commonly translated 'God' in our version, and Jehovah, translated 'Lord.' Elohim is the plural of Eloah (in Arabic Allah), a form which occurs only in poetry and in a few passages of later Hebrew. The plural form of Elohim has given rise to much discussion. The fanciful idea that it referred to the trinity of persons in the godhead hardly finds now a supporter among scholars."

This is orthodox authority, and is sufficient for the purposes of this essay, though a great number of similar opinions might be adduced. If we now translate the Hebrew Elohim honestly and correctly we shall have the gods in most instances where it has been translated "God." The correct translation will then give a very different idea of theology, and it will be immediately seen that polytheism was the underlying conception that inspired the book of Genesis, upon which all the succeeding books and theology are based. In illustration of this new rendering I will give the first chapter of Genesis with the honest translation. I will use the "authorized version." The Vulgate or Roman version does not differ much from it in this respect:

1. In the beginning the gods created the heaven and the earth.

2. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the spirit [or spirits] of the gods moved upon the face of the waters.

3. And the gods said, Let there be light; and there was light.

4. And the gods saw the light, that it was good: and the gods divided the light from the darkness.

5. And the gods called the light day, and the darkness they called night. And the evening and the morning was the first day.

6. And the gods said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

7. And the gods made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament, and it was so.

8. And the gods called the firmament heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.

9. And the gods said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear. And it was so.

10. And the gods called the dry land earth; and the gathering together of the waters called they seas; and the gods saw that it was good.

11. And the gods said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after its kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth; and it was so.

12. And the earth brought forth grass, and the herb yielding seed after its kind, the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after its kind. And the gods saw that it was good.

13. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

14. And the gods said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs and for seasons, and for days and years.

15. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth. And it was so.

16. And the gods made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; they made the stars also.

17. And the gods set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth,

18. And to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness; and the gods saw that it was good.

19. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

20. And the gods said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

21. And the gods created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind; and the gods saw that it was good.

22. And the gods blessed them, saying, Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the waters of the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth.

23. And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

24. And the gods said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping things, and beast of the earth after his kind; and it was so.

25. And the gods made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after his kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind; and the gods saw that it was good.

26. And the gods said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

27. So the gods created man in their own image, in the image of the gods created they him; male and female created they them.

28. And the gods blessed them, and the gods said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

29. And the gods said, Behold, we have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of the earth, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat.

30. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, we have given every green herb for meat; and it was so.

31. And the gods saw everything that they had made; and behold, it was very good.

This translation removes the mystery and inconsistency that have always attached to the twenty-sixth verse, where a plurality of gods is unquestionably indicated—male gods and female gods, "let us," "in our image," "after our likeness," "in the image of the gods created they him," "male and female created they them." It is worthy of note that "male" and "female" are words not used in referring to the lower creatures, which fact indicates an intention to emphasize the idea that there are male and female gods.

Again, this true rendering of the legend of creation plays havoc with the current theology of the Christian and so-called civilized nations, and shows beyond doubt that what passes for monotheism is in fact derived from a polytheistic source, the book of Genesis, Moses to the contrary notwithstanding. The Bible is full of polytheism, in spite of the efforts of ancient and modern priests to establish monotheism. In the light of polytheism the scriptures become more intelligible and easier of comprehension. It is a far more rational theory than the one-god notion, which renders the Bible absolutely unmeaning, and which has caused the vast amount of division, antagonism, and warfare that makes up the history of biblical religions.

New Britain, Conn.

EMORY BOYD.

The Mining Man and His Ruth.

DEDICATED TO G. E. M.

Within a Sabbath-school one day

I heard a story wherein lay

Many a moral, clear as day.

"Twas of, forsooth,

In very truth,

Naomi and her daughter Ruth.

I went back to my cabin lone,

And took that honored volume down

Which as the "Word of God" is known,

And read, forsooth,

In very truth,

The story of the goodly Ruth.

Upon my couch I laid me down—

I was alone, my "partner's" gone—

And thought deep thoughts of what is known

About, forsooth,

In very truth,

Naomi and the pretty Ruth.

I wondered then how it would look

If written in a modern book,

And if the folks around would brook

If I, forsooth,

In very truth,

Should be a Boaz to some Ruth.

But soon my thoughts to facts gave o'er;

I heard soft steps upon the floor,

Then at my feet, just as of yore,

Lay down, forsooth,

In very truth,

A woman, like the storied Ruth.

But instant fear me then o'ercame,

I shrieked: "This is some shameless scheme,

Blackmail, to sully my good name.

Avaunt, forsooth!

In very truth,

I'll be no Boaz to a Ruth!"

She pleading said: "Please do not stir

Up rows about my presence here;

At thy fair 'handmaid' don't demur;

I wish, forsooth,

In very truth,

(If thou'lt be Boaz) to be Ruth."

I caught the gleam of tender eyes;

I heard her bosom's timid sighs;

Soft pity did in me arise;

I said, forsooth,

In very truth,

"I'll be thy Boaz, be my Ruth."

I reached adown my lowly bed,

Where, at my feet, she's coyly laid,

I caught her—our tom cat by the head,

And 'woke, forsooth!

In very truth,

I was no Boaz; there's no Ruth!

And there came durn near being a tom cat no more for-eyer. He has not tried to palm himself off for Ruth since.

The people who attended the joint debate between Samuel P. Putnam and Rabbi Freudenthal on Sunday last enjoyed a rare treat. The Free-thinker, Putnam, is a master of language and a clear, logical thinker and reasoner. His sentences were each grammatically and rhetorically correct, and his ideas were clearly and forcibly expressed. Dr. Freudenthal is no less logical and scholarly. He handled his subject like a master and is a worthy opponent of any man. The Jewish people may well be proud of their champion. The debate began at 2:30 p.m., and lasted till 5 p.m. At 8 o'clock the contest was renewed, and closed at 10:30. The Opera House was crowded from first to last, and the interest seemed as intense at the close of the debate as at the beginning. The speakers seemed to taste "that stern joy which warriors feel in foemen worthy of their steel."—Trinidad (Col.) Monitor.

Observations.

Everybody who reads the papers knows now that Mr. George Gould, the son of Jay, has imported a foreign count and married his sister to it. George is a chip of the old block. When Jay Gould wanted a railroad, an election district, or a legislature, he bought it. So it is with the son: a nobleman in the family being necessary to his social elevation, he purchased one. The bargain was of the nature of a swap, Mr. Gould tendering the person of his sister Anna, and how much to boot only the family and its immediate friends are informed, in exchange for the title and the social advantages. Archbishop Corrigan, acting as conveyancer, legalized the barter.

Since Anna's paved her brother's way
To social heights, and since
There's prospect that he'll be some day
The uncle of a prince;
And since she's wife of Castellane—
A la française, of course—
But heaven—or divorce.

Grant Allen, a very learned, highly respected, widely read, and altogether distinguished fiction and essay writer, of England, has just produced a story entitled, "The Woman Who Did." He wrote it, he says, for the first time in his life wholly and solely to satisfy his own taste and his own conscience. It will therefore be seen that this is "a novel with a purpose." Colonel Ingersoll would call it medicinal. Incidentally to satisfying his taste and conscience, as aforesaid, Mr. Allen has frankly told his belief in the doctrine of sexual freedom; but as the history of the world's martyrs has not sufficient glamour about it to allure ambitious persons into the pursuit of martyrdom, so our author has not served the fruit of his doctrine in a way likely to make the practice of the system irresistibly attractive. However, the tragedies of "The Woman Who Did," wherein the heroin does not legally marry, are no worse than those of "The Heavenly Twins," whose characters are reduced to a common denominator by the rule laid down in orthodox arithmetic; so that, recking the rede of both, the lesson is that whether we marry or not we shall regret it. And that is probably true, for the fact is that neither marriage nor association in freedom, nor even life itself, is on the whole a striking success. But being alive we are possessed by a crazy instinct to remain so, and a still crazier one to perpetuate the race. Out of these lunacies all our troubles rise, and marriage, free love, prostitution, and continence are but outward and visible signs of an inward and inappeasable dissatisfaction. There is little danger of our getting too gay in a world like this, where whatever is wrong, and I, for one, am not only willing that every individual should choose his own way in the pursuit of happiness, but am amused when he does so. I can only regret that the chances are so many against his finding it.

"The Woman Who Did" is the story of a girl who regards marriage as slavery and rejects it. She is of course educated, intellectual, honest, well connected, beautiful, and pure. She accepts, and also returns, the love, so called, of a man similarly gifted, situated, and endowed. For a year they live their chaste life, both being disowned by their parents. Before the first child is born its father dies, which necessarily makes the experiment a failure on the part of the woman, and still more so on the part of the man. The surviving parent builds high hopes on the child, who is to be a female messiah and regenerate humanity. It proves to be a girl, but contrary to expectations she grows up a conservative and scorns her mother, who dies by her own hand in order that the daughter may marry respectably.

All of which is inexpressibly sad, and tragic to an uncalled-for degree; but Mr. Allen has a purpose, which is to show what a brute civilized society is in its treatment of those who reject its rules and decline to practice its vices; for it was the hand of representative respectability that pushed this woman from disaster to catastrophe. He makes his point easily, and, intentionally or not, also raises the question whether it is wiser to fight the brute or to fool him.

"The Woman Who Did" is an astonishing piece of literature: according to the hysterical reviewers its author's offense is at least equal in gravity to that of its heroin.

Elevating my voice at such an angle that it may reach the ears of those apostles of Social Freedom who profess to think that marriage is not a sacrament, I would call the attention of said persons to a case recently adjudicated upon in New York. A daily paper printed the statement that a certain citizen, whom it named, had a young girl locked up in his place of business and guarded by bloodhounds. The citizen brought a libel suit against the paper, and although the report of the trial which I have before me does not hint that the statement was disproved, a verdict was found for the plaintiff and he recovered a fortune in damages. Does some gentle reader ask "Why?" Did not the man lock up the female and put bloodhounds on guard? It is not disputed, by the report, that he did. But then, it was proven to the satisfaction of the jury that she was his wife. The blindest and most determined carper at marriage as a sacrament must admit that if some priest of religion or law had not given the citizen a legal right over the person of the woman the newspaper might have libeled him with safety, and he would have suffered in reputation. Even the female, with no legal protector, might have felt that she had reason to complain.

Marriage is a divine and binding institution, and it has been such ever since the first expectant groom beat the first blushing bride into insensibility with a club, and dragged her into his cave by the hair.

The Freethinkers of Oregon celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine, and some of the orthodox people of the same state hanged him in effigy. With these specimen products of Liberalism and of religion before him, the Rev. Mr. Locke, of Portland, was moved to deliver a sermon on the "Fruits of Infidelity." No pomological expert can censure him for the choice he made, for the fruit of Infidelity, as illustrated in the present case, is good, being nothing less than a display of gratitude for services rendered and the paying of honor where honor has been long overdue. The fruit of religion, on the other hand, ripened under a hundred years of freedom, is the hanging in effigy of the foremost of the patriots who provided that freedom a home. The one fruit improves under liberty; the other decays. The one, grown on the tree planted by Paine, it is worth our trouble to pick; the other, dropping rotten from the gallows-tree, is enjoyed by no animal that I know of except the religious hog whose taste is not sufficiently cultivated to relish humpy salmon.

I do not doubt that it is of interest to the thousands who read this Freethought journal, and to the hundreds who write for it, to know that eminent men of science object to the distinction of "scientists." Huxley long ago rejected it in favor of "student of nature," and others have followed his example. "Naturalist" is suggested as its successor, and also "philosopher;" but the first has now a definition confined to students of animal life, while the second may mean someone who cares nothing about physical science—a metaphysician, perhaps, who deals with notions instead of substances. Philologists, the students of language, tell us that "scientist" is a malformation and a freak among words. It has no mate and can have none until we call a person who makes a specialty of finance a "finantist." Literary men are satisfied to be known as "men of letters," and they leave to those who use words for their own sake the monopoly of imported tongue-twisters like littérateur. Some years ago "physicist" gained more or less acceptance among readers as a substitute for "scientist." As pronounced—fizzysist—it suggests a soda-fountain assistant; but it is misuttered, for historically physics is entitled to a final k, the sound of which it still retains, and the word should be fizzikist, and its meaning "one who studies or practices medicine." If not, then the primitive is "physics," the science of nature, and its votaries are physicists. That so feeble a suffix as ist should be leaned on so heavily by so many English-speaking people is one of the things to an understanding of which I have never been able to rise. It is worth while to be a Freethinker just to be rid of the final hiss that goes with so many other labels—though we are in danger, from the people who prefer to call themselves Liberalists, of losing our heritage and appearing as Freethinkists, corrected under criticism to Freethoughtists, which latter formation is unassailable if "Liberalist" is to be admitted to the vocabulary. Once, while in the West, I was accused of being an Infidelist by a preacher from Arkansas. There are some two hundred ists inside the dictionary—the array appropriately ending with "vacuist"—saying nothing about Mr. Wakeman's "meipsist" * outside of it; so that "scientist" can be spared without making us poor. By calling the men who devote their time to the discovery or classification of the facts of nature simply "students of nature," which is all they are, and by occasionally reminding them that they are no more than that—nor yet beyond the primer class—we shall get honest work out of them, I think. And then, when they come before us to recite their lessons, if they attempt to expound the unknowable, we can call them to the book by inquiring where they learned that. The sage Stephen Pearl Andrews deduced from his observation and experience a law which he named the antithetical repetition of the lowest in the highest. It is illustrated in the lives of all thoughtful persons. At the beginning the individual knows little or nothing; then follows a period when he is reluctant to admit that anything of importance exists outside the limits of his information; he ends, like Sir Isaac Newton, by confessing that he is still a child picking up shells on the shore of a boundless and unknown sea. So it is, I suppose, that a man so learned as Huxley, approaching the youth of old age, finds himself, as fifty years ago, a student of nature. At twenty-five he probably called himself a "scientist."

*See The Liberal Club in last week's issue.

In his "Musings," published in the Investigator, Otto Wettstein remarks: "To postulate eternal potencies eternally inactive; then, suddenly, becoming active, is infinitely more irrational than eternal potencies eternally active." If Otto can do that sort of thing while musing dreamily, what couldn't he do if he should write when he is asleep!

A mass meeting, to which a large audience was attracted by means of brass bands, sky-rockets, and allied methods of appealing to the reason and intelligence, was held in this city last week. It was addressed by the Rev. Dr. Rainsford, of St. George's, a church with two steeples, who proposed, as a compromise with the Sabbatarians, that saloons be allowed to be open on Sunday from 12 m. until 10 at night—religion in the morning, rum in the afternoon. Discussing this scheme, a Newark, N. J., citizen—it appears that all New Jersey's fools are not confined to Hoboken or the asylum—wants to know through the Herald why Dr. Rainsford did not enlarge his plan and say:

As stealing is such a temptation, and man will break the law, we will make the law suit the man, and for a few hours in the afternoon, or at dusk, legalize stealing.

If rank idiocy of that kind deserves notice, it is well answered by a paragraph which appears in a Seventh Day Advent paper, very conveniently at hand, and which follows:

Adultery, theft, and murder are crimes on all days and in all places. Labor, business, and recreation are neither crimes nor misdemeanors, but rather necessities and fundamental virtues. Sunday laws declare that these virtues become civil crimes and misdemeanors if performed on Sunday, and the religious leaders declare them to be sins. And yet these same religious leaders who ought to be honest and consistent declare that Sunday laws are only "civil" affairs with no religious basis as to their enforcement!

That disposes of the Newark zany's question, and I would add that it also disposes of Dr. Rainsford; for however superior the sanctity of Sunday may be as compared with that of week days, it would stump the pastor of St. George's to show that one part of it is any more sacred than the other, and if an open saloon is allowable Sunday afternoon no good reason suggests itself to me why it should not be allowable in the forenoon. Is the nightcap necessarily less sinful than the cocktail, or does the clergyman object, for obvious reasons, to the members of his congregation taking eye-openers before listening to his discourse? To speak seriously, not to say sadly, Dr. Rainsford will never be able to answer the hee-haw of the New Jersey animal until he takes sides with either the "drys" or the "wets."

What the Sunday observers as well as the temporizers and tinkers lack, is acquaintance with the astronomical fact that Sunday is simply a division or period of time marking a diurnal revolution of our planet; that, being such, no sanctity can possibly attach to it, and any attempt to violate it must necessarily end in failure. We might as well talk about breaking twenty-four degrees of longitude as about violating the twenty-four hours of time called Sunday. The notion of the violation of a day is one with the idea of ravishing space, assaulting the abstract, or committing an offense against duration. In the nature of things it can't be done.

A newspaper dispatch from Chicago relates that the Interior, the organ of the Presbyterian church in the West, appeared last week with the partially unclad picture of a prominent burlesque actress covering almost the entire first page, and that the clergy and elders rose up in wrath and have been chasing the editor, Rev. Dr. W. C. Gray, ever since. Dr. Gray explains that a man came along and told him that the picture represented the biblical personification of "Hope." He thought "Hope" was very beautiful, and not knowing that she was going to play at one of the theaters of the city, he put her on the first page in all her undraped perfection.

In his next issue that editor ought to print his own picture to show what Faith personified looks like. It might not be handsome, or have good legs, but it would bring out the idea. G. E. M.

Reasons Why the French Revolution Was Necessary.

In the eighteenth century the privileged classes counted about 260,000 to 270,000 persons. Of these, 140,000 were nobles, 130,000 clergy, or about 25,000 to 30,000 noble families; 23,000 monks in 2,500 monasteries, 37,000 nuns in 1,500 convents, and 60,000 curates, vicars, etc. There was 1 noble family to every 1,000 persons, or to each square league of land, and a convent, etc., to every 6 or 7 leagues.

The soil was divided 15 to the crown and communes, 1-5 to the Third Estate, 1-5 to the rural populations, 1-5 to the nobles, 1-5 to the clergy. Deducting public lands, 1-2 belonged to the privileged classes, and this half, with its castles, palaces, etc., naturally the richest. The value of the clergy lands capitalized amounted to 4,000,000,000 francs, yielding an income of 80 to 100 million francs (double this sum for an estimate of the value in money of to-day), and this did not include the dime (tithe), about 123,000,000 a year.

Three hundred and ninety-nine monks at Prémontré estimated their revenues at 1,000,000 livres* and their capital 45,000,000. The Provincial of the Dominicans of Toulouse admitted for his 236 monks 200,000 livres net, not counting convents, real estate, negroes, etc., in the colonies, valued at several millions.

The 258 Benedictines had a revenue of 1,800,000 livres. Those of St. Maur estimated the movable property of their churches and monastery at 2,400,000 and revenue at 8,000,000, not including other sources of revenue.

Dom Rocourt, of Clairvaux, had 300,000 to 400,000 livres income. Cardinal Rohan, archbishop of Strasbourg, had more than 1,000,000 (National Archives).

In Franche-Comté, Alsace, and Roussillon the clergy owned half the territory; in Hainault and Artois, three-quarters; in Cambresis, 1,400 out of 1,700 plow areas belonged to them; almost the whole of Lively belonged to the bishop of Puy, the abbot of La Chaise, the noble chapter of Brioude, and to the seigneurs of Polignac. The canons of St. Claude, in the Jura, were the proprietors of 12,000 serfs or mainmorts. It is said there were 1,500,000 individuals who wore serfs' collars (Clerget, Beaunot, Memoirs de Bailly, etc). The seigneurs could demand of these 10 to 12 days corvée (statute labor) per annum and a fixed yearly tax.

In the Barony of Choiseul in Champagne the inhabitants were required to plow the seigneurs' land, sow, reap, and gather in his crops. Each plot of ground, house, and head of cattle, paid a quit claim; children inherited from their parents only if they remained with them at the time of their decease, otherwise the seigneurs did.

In various places the taxes on different things were called poursoin on de Sauvement, paid for general protection; guet et garde, military protection; afforage, tax on various beverages; fouage, tax on each fireside; pulverage, tax on passing flocks of sheep; lots et ventes, lord's dues, tax amounting to 1-6 or 1-5, or 1-4 of every sale of land or lease exceeding nine years, etc.

Besides these, the seigneur levied taxes on tolls, on bridges, highways, fords, or boats ascending or descending rivers, he having to repair the bridges, fords, tow paths, etc.—a rich source of revenue.

In many provinces the seigneur levied taxes on pastures after the crops had been garnered, as well as tax on cattle grazing on waste lands and commons. Unnavigable rivers belonged to him with their islands and fish. He had the right of chase everywhere, even in private parks. He enjoyed also the right of banvin, that is, he had the privilege of selling his own wine to the exclusion of all others for 30 to 40 days after vintage. In Touraine he had the right of preage, that is, he might send his horses and cows to graze, under a guard, on his subjects' meadows. He had also the monopoly of a dove cote, whence thousands of pigeons would issue to feed on all grounds without any one daring to kill them, etc.

For keeping market place with its scales and weights he levied taxes on provisions and merchandise. He obliged the inhabitants to use his ovens, wine press, mill, and slaughter house, and destroyed the constructions of his rivals.

In the Jura and Nivernois he could pursue runaway serfs and demand at their death their property whether in his own domains or acquired elsewhere. At St. Claude he acquired a right over any one who passed a year and a day in any house on his seignury.

Revenues of some Bishops.—In the Almanach Royal and La France Ecclesiastique for 1788 may be seen their admitted revenues, but the veritable were one-half more for the bishops and double or triple for the abbays (always double these amounts to get an idea of their equivalents in our money).

The 131 archbishops and bishops possessed in the aggregate 5,600,000 livres of episcopal income and 1,200,000 in abbays averaging about 50,000 per head as in the private record, in reality 100,000. Some of the important sees were magnificently endowed:

Sens.....	70,000 livres
Verdun.....	74,000 "
Tours.....	83,000 "
Arch.....	120,000 "
Metz.....	120,000 "
Albi.....	120,000 "
Narbonne.....	160,000 "
Paris.....	200,000 "
Cambray.....	200,000 "

This is according to the official report and amounted to probably half as much more in sums actually collected.

Thirty-three abbays produced to their abbés 25,000 to 120,000 livres. These sums do not include such sources of revenue as feudal rights, etc.

State of the Judiciary.—According to the Memoirs of Rene de Hauteville, advocate to the Parlement de Saint Brienc, October 5, 1776, the number of seigneurial courts in Brittany was immense, the pleaders being obliged to pass through four or five jurisdictions before reaching the Parlement.

"Where," he asks, "is justice rendered? In the cabarets, in the tavern, where, in the bosom of intoxication and debauchery, the judge sells justice to whoever pays most for it."

"Impunity," says Revaudon, a contemporary, "is nowhere greater than in the seigneurial tribunals; . . . the foulest crimes receive no consideration there, for the seigneurs dread supplying the means for a criminal trial, while their judges or prosecuting attorneys fear that they will not be paid for their pleadings. Not only," he continues, "do they give no pay to their officers of justice, or take them at a discount, but what is worse the greater portion of them make a sale of these offices. In spite of the edict of 1693, the judges thus appointed take no steps to be admitted into the Royal Courts, and they take no oaths. What is the result? Justice, too often administered by knaves, degenerates into brigandage or into a frightful impunity."—Random Notes from Taine's "Ancien Régime," by M. W. O'B, in Secular Thought.

Intolerable Oppression.

The argument in favor of abolishing Sabbatarian Sunday laws is unanswerable. It is not the province of the state to prescribe religious observances of any kind. Under our system of absolutely secular government and absolute religious liberty, the law has rightfully no more to do with Sabbaths than with sacraments. Its sole concern should be to protect every citizen equally in his right to do as he pleases with regard to religious observances. Freedom to worship God does not mean freedom to compel other people to worship God in the same way.

Laws prescribing the observance of any day as a Sabbath or as "holy time," to use the language of the New York statute, are utterly obnoxious to the genius of our system. They are unfair, unequal, and oppressiv. They ought to be stricken from the statute book as laws irreconcilable with the fundamental ideas of American liberty.

So far as these laws relate to questions of excise there is the additional objection that the conditions which prevail in this city are radically different from those of rural villages. New York is the most cosmopolitan of cities. To a large proportion of its population the enforcement of a law to close the beer saloons on Sunday seems and is an intolerable oppression. So strong is this feeling that in fact there never has been police power enough to enforce such a law. The attempts made to enforce it result in making lawbreakers of multitudes who desire to be honest citizens, in teaching other multitudes to look leniently upon lawbreaking, and in converting police power into organized blackmail.

In such a matter New York city ought to be free to make its own police regulations in harmony with its own people's habits, ideas, and wishes.

It is time to free this great city from the grandmotherly government of rural sentiment. Still more imperative is it to free our statute books from blue laws that are violative alike of personal liberty and of the basic ideas of our American system of government.—New York World.

News and Notes.

I find that the churches are always on the move for something novel and dangerous. They do not trust to one instrumentality, but bring into play every possible invention. The latest idea of church propaganda is the "Junior Republic," and this promises to be a very successful fad unless it is looked after. It is a nice conspiracy for the turning of the school into a church institution. What can not be done directly will be done indirectly.

The plan is to take all the school children between the ages of ten and twenty-one now in the public schools and form them into a vast organization to be called the "Junior Republic." This organization among the children is to be, in the miniature, the republic of the United States. It is divided into the same number of states, it has the same number and kind of officers throughout, president, cabinet, senate, house of representatives, etc. The "Junior Republic" is to go through all the forms of election, passing laws, etc. It adopts the form of the United States government, and thus professes to be a truly republican and American institution whose supreme purpose is to train our children in the principles and practices of genuine democracy. However, in the adoption of the constitution this important and radical change is declared, "We believe in the God of the Bible." This amendment was pronounced by the instigator of the affair to be really the gist of the whole matter, and it was adopted at the preliminary meeting with cheers and clapping of hands; led on by women of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, who were present—over twenty-one years old, however, and apparently the moving spirits.

Now it can be easily seen that if this "Junior Republic" is organized under the patronage of our public schools, and millions of school children become its members, it will be a powerful instrumentality in the hands of the church. These millions of children, who are to become voters, will be trained constantly in the idea a "God in the Constitution," and when, from being imitative voters in the "Junior Republic," they are real voters in the American Republic, they of course will be ready to put God into the actual Constitution, as they already put it into the imagined constitution. This is a long-headed scheme of the ecclesiastical party, and must be met at once and overthrown. This "Junior Republic" must simply be knocked in the head. It is already on its feet in Chicago, and the children are quite eager about it, and seem to think it a very brilliant undertaking, as naturally they would. But the whole thing is playing right into the hands of the church. It is a kind of political annex to the public school—voluntary, of course—and not under the control of the public school, but with the prestige of the public school, formed on the basis of the public school, inspired by the public school, and yet a thoroughgoing partisan and theological affair, anti-American and revolutionary. It is simply a conspiracy, and it should be completely exposed and defeated by the Liberals of the country. Such an organization as that, if successful, will do more to enthrone the church than any other instrumentality now in the hands of the church. If this "Junior Republic" is fairly started in Chicago, then it is expected to push the matter in other cities, and finally over the whole country, enlisting all the children in what is practically a week-day Christian Sunday-school.

I hope that a large number of copies of "Federation and Union" will be circulated by Liberal friends. Keep it going. It is one of the best campaign documents out. It has a variety of matter. It is a good presentation of our various work, on the line of Secularism. It will help educate the people. Please send in orders to E. C. Reichwald, 188 South Water street, Chicago.

I consider the case of Mr. Fleckten, of Minnesota, one of the greatest importance. I hope friends will rally to his support and join hands with THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is a question which reaches a long way into the future. No matter where it is fought, in Minnesota, or any state or district, it is of national concern. As soon as the Federation gets a little money ahead it will use it to help push this case.

I shall be at Canal Dover, and perhaps some other places in Ohio, the last of this month, March 30th and 31st. I shall lecture in Boston, April 7th and 14th; at the New York Liberal Club, April 19th, and at Brooklyn and Newark, April 21st, and set sail for England, April 24th, in "The City of Berlin." My plans are all arranged now, and I shall see our English friends without fail. I anticipate great pleasure in this trip. It has been a life-long dream, and now especially delightful since the colors of Freethought mingle with the new and wonderful experiences. And as these great thoughts and realities, the splendors of the old world, the glorious ranks of freedom, the noble spirits, the magnificent comradeship, breathe into my own life and brain, I shall endeavor to bring my readers into a vision of these varied and enchanting scenes. We will travel together, though outwardly we may be far apart. Whatever I see shall be pictured in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Chicago, March 14, 1895. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Campaign Book.

I have pleasure in acknowledging the following subscriptions to the book of our last joint congress: Wm. M. Matthews, D. M. Worley, John Dean, Mrs. L. A. Turley. I should be glad to hear from more of our friends. The treasurer is somewhat in debt and should be enabled to pay up. It has cost about $400 to publish the pamphlet and to print constitutions and circulars and mail them. I have added to our roll several thousand new members whose names have been sent in by friends to whom I mailed constitutions for signatures. We have now almost ten thousand members on our books. It costs nothing to join, but it takes money to run this office. One hundred dollars is needed for stamps alone to send out a circular requiring one cent postage to every member, not to reckon printing, envelopes, etc. Of course times are hard and money scarce, but any friend who feels able to contribute a mite will help this noble cause along mightily.

Jesus and the Colt.

"Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb?
And shall I fear to steal a horse,
Or blush to ride the same?"

It may seem strange that one living in a land where Jesus is worshiped as a god, should ask the question, "Did Jesus steal a colt?" and were it not for his own testimony (Luke xix, 29-31) probably no one ever would have accused him of such an act. His teaching and precepts in general are good, and but little, if any, inferior to those of Buddha or Confucius, from whom he undoubtedly copied them; yet, I have never read a word charging that either Buddha or Confucius was a thief, and I cannot, for a moment, believe that Jesus ever converted to his own use property belonging to another, or sent his disciples to steal a colt. Furthermore, I would not repeat the story were it not that nearly every family in Christendom has, at some time, either bought or had given them a Bible in which the story appears. It is as follows:

Go ye into the village over against you; in the which at your entering, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon yet never man sat; loose him and bring him hither, and if any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him?

If the record is true, and Jesus actually did order his disciples to so purloin a colt, I have no plea to make for the man-god, for all criminal law would hold him equally guilty with his deluded disciples who "led the horse away." We have no evidence of any kind to show that the colt belonged to Jesus, in fee simple, or that he had a mortgage lien on the animal; to the contrary, his own words condemn him when he says: "If any man ask you, Why do ye loose him? thus shall ye say unto him, Because the Lord hath need of him."

I can see no reason why a god should need a colt in such a hurry that he would have to steal one, when we are told there is nothing impossible with God, and he could have made a two-year-old colt in a minute (though he would not have been two years old), and had him ready broke to carry double, if necessary, without extra expense; and why Jesus set such a bad example before his disciples (which many of them still follow), I cannot understand. From a general digest of the matter, I judge that the end justified the means, and that it was all for the glory of God. This being true, why should we condemn the Jesuits for doing anything and everything they choose, when "the end justifies the means" and "for the glory of God?"

Whether the Lord had need of heretical ashes (for Christian lye) in the Dark Ages, I know not, but the end must have justified the means when, between the years 1600 and 1630, the Christians burned at the stake over 270,000 human beings as heretics to the Roman faith. Otherwise the omnipresent Lord would not have been lounging around without calling a policeman. To say the least, it looks rather bewildering to read that Jesus commands us not to steal, and then commands his disciples to borrow a rope that he knew had a colt on the other end of it. Perhaps this is why his vicegerents preach one thing and practice another, and why, like a guideboard, they point the way, but never go themselves. They teach what to do to go to heaven, but they cannot indicate the direction of either heaven or hell, and

Had I the colt that Jesus stole,
I should not know 'tis pity—
Which road to take to land my soul
Within the golden city.

If the olden saying is true that "what is bred in the bone cannot be whipped from the body," Jesus must have been "a chip from the old block," for Jehovah is credited with saying to his chosen people (Ex. iii, 21, 22), "When ye go ye shall not go empty; but every woman shall borrow of her neighbor and of her that sojourns in her house jewels of gold and raiment; and ye shall put them upon your sons and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil the Egyptians." This is theft of the meanest kind, and no other god but Jehovah would ever have risked his reputation by ordering it in writing.

Mine eyes are dim; I cannot see
The great Jehovah's plan.
Did God—will you enlighten me?
Wish for the fall of man?
Pray tell me if you will and can,
Did God, in thunderbolt,
Bid Moses slay the Egyptian,
Or Christ to steal that colt?

It's no go, my Christian friend. You never can make thinking people believe that any god ever stole a colt or cut up such capers as you say Jehovah did; or that any real, sure-enough god ever cursed the world because Eve ate an apple. You can fool our unsophisticated women and artless children—make them believe that the Lord of this universe was so put to it for a colt that he had to steal one—but intelligent people who have no bread and butter depending on the issue will swallow no such truck. A. D. SWAN.

DEPONT, March 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper stands ahead of everything with me. You will find inclosed $5-$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, 1895, and $3 to help you in the hard work you are doing; to be used as your best judgment may dictate. As ever, a friend to your paper,

P. PALMER.

He Admires Buchner.

JUNCTION CITY, KAN., March 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I wrote a few days ago that I had not yet received "Force and Matter," but I was expecting it by mail and it was at the express office when I wrote. It is grand. Inclosed please find $2 to apply on subscription for the reliable old TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours in fidelity,

Fred L. Hoffman Wanted.

COMMERCE, TEX., March 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I desire the address of Fred L. Hoffman, a native of Germany. When last heard of, in 1888, he was in Brunswick, Ga. Since that time I have had several letters returned from his address at that place. If he is living and sees this, I will be glad to hear from him. Address above.

He Is Alone in His Joy.

WOODSTOCK, N. B., Feb. 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.50 to renew my subscription, and for the ANNUAL and Ingersoll's "Lecture on the Bible."

I should like to have seen more names than my own in the list of subscribers to "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for New Brunswick. Freethinkers do not know what they have missed by not securing it. It is a splendid work and should be in every Freethinker's house.

Yours truly,

T. S. DENT.

ROYAL CENTER, MD., Feb. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7 for paper, Alexander's "Dynamic Theory," the ANNUAL, Ingersoll's "About the Bible," and of the remainder, $1 for your own use, and $1 for the Minnesota man if he needs it; if not, you can claim both of them, for I am satisfied you will do your best if you get a little encouragement.

Good luck to Brother George and all the rest of our noble boys.

Yours,

GEO. HENDRICK.

Much-Needed Assistance.

HIGHLAND, ILL., March 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, of which I wish to add $2.50 to the fund for the defense of J. B. Wise, of Kansas; $2.50 you will please use for the assistance of Mr. Fleckten, of Minnesota, and the balance ($5) you may use for distributing Freethought literature where it is needed and will do the most good for our cause.

Hoping that the Freethinkers of this country will respond liberally to your call in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 23, I remain,

Respectfully,

Begins to See the Light.

VAN WERT, IA., March 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I was born in a Christian family, and reared in the Methodist Episcopal church in fear of an eternal hell. But this winter I have had free access to your paper and have had my eyes opened as never before. I had an argument with a Christian man about taxing church property; he said it was a free institution, was free for everybody, but it proved different with both churches here. A few days ago an Adventist minister wanted to hold a series of meetings, but both churches closed their doors against him. Then talk about the spirit of God; it is the spirit of selfish greed, and I never yet saw anything else manifested in the church.

We have good timber here with which Freethought lecturers could work.

Yours for truth and liberty,

S. K. DENNIS.

Two Great Books.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Feb. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the "tab" that my subscription expires the first of March, so please find inclosed $3 for renewal.

I received Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and was very much pleased with it. We were also much pleased with Col. R. G. Ingersoll's lecture on the Bible here last month.

Mrs. Todd and I are now reading M. D. Conway's "Life of Paine," which we were very much pleased and surprised to find in our public library. We admire Paine more and more, and think he was one of the grandest characters that ever touched this globe. I think his birthday should be made a holiday and celebrated by all Liberals.

S. C. TODD.

He Appreciates Your Kindness.

NEW HAVEN, O., Feb. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please return thanks, through your valuable paper, to the many kind Liberal friends who sent me Freethought papers? I have had great satisfaction in reading them, and particularly THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would especially thank my kind friend in New York city, also one in Alhambra, Ill., and one at Villa Grove, Col. I can assure you that after I have read these papers I shall try to put them where they will do some good for the cause for which we contend. I have received no papers for the last week or ten days, but I hope the kind friends will not forget me altogether, but will send me a paper once in awhile; and think how it would feel, after having plenty of the kind of reading you like, to have it all out off.

Yours for truth and justice,

THOS. S. CHARITY.

An Unanswered Question.

SCRANTON, PA., March 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Excuse me for getting behind with my payments for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I had intended to take advantage of some of the premiums and get some cheap books with my yearly subscription, but I find times with me too hard at present. Some of my Christian friends who have been shocked by my ideas of their God have failed to keep their promises and pay me, and I consider it doubtful if they ever pay me. The good religious people tell me that God is omnipotent and omniscient, and that he desires that all men shall do just right, and that when man was created the first thing he did was wrong, and after that God raised a perfect being from the holy ghost and a woman. Now I ask them why, if, as they claim, God wants all men perfect, he did not make them all by the ghost and a woman. They cannot answer me.

With best wishes to the great Col. R. G. Ingersoll and the name of freedom, I remain, fraternally yours,

C. D. TOBY.

A Daughter of Whom to be Proud.

FOND DU LAC, WIS., March 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I notice our time is up for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Now, my daughter and I cannot do without it; she wants Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and your paper; "Thumbscrew and Rack," and Miss Wixon's speech at the World's Fair. She says she will have them if she has to go out by the day washing to get the money to pay for them. She wants them to be sent in her name, Harriet E. Pierce, for I shall be 84 years old the 16th day of April. I cannot perform manual labor to obtain a living; my daughter works and shares her bread and butter with me. I have seen better times, but fire burned all I had twice. I am now a poor man; I am dependent on charity for my living. Now I would like to read Paine's "Age of Reason." If you can donate that book to me I will circulate it all I can. There are twelve churches here, so you see Liberals have to keep quiet, especially business men, but my daughter won't keep quiet for any of them; she likes to pitch into them once in a while.

From your Liberal friends,

HARRIET E. PIERCE,
P. P. ROBBINS.

Lippard to Aid Fleckten.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send by express to the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER $6 worth of my pamphlet edition of an old address on Thomas Paine. Four dollars' worth, I believe, would have to be sold by and for THE TRUTH SEEKER on my subscription account. I hope to soon have some greenbacks to enable me to get some of your valuable books.

I desire to aid the Fleckten case by contributing $2 worth of my pamphlet—Geo. Lippard's address on Thomas Paine. It contains a biographical sketch of the author of this remarkable address, delivered in 1852, in which he eulogizes Paine's political works and condemns his religious ones.

Every admirer of Paine should have this lecture, as its author suffered great persecution at the time. He was one of the daring ones and used his pen in the effort to have Paine's portrait put in Independence Hall. It has a fine photo engraving of its author. There may be many persons who desire to have this lecture. To those I would say that you can both honor the memory of Paine and help the cause of Fleckten by sending twenty cents to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER for the pamphlet. This old address had been slumbering, with the dust of forty-two years upon it, until I resurrected it.

I am not a bank president, nor do I own a gold mine, but I have authorized THE TRUTH SEEKER to act as a clearing-house, and those readers who send the silver to be redeemed can have an address that is equal to the silver they send.

JAS. B. ELLIOTT.

We Think "God" is the Fundamental Superstition.

WANTAGE, N. Y., March 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write to thank you for kindly sending me THE TRUTH SEEKER after my subscription expired. Be assured the omission to send the money for renewal was not due to carelessness or indifference, but to extreme scarcity of funds. Am hoping and expecting soon to be in a position not only to keep my subscription paid up, but to do something further in aid of the Liberal cause. Just as soon as I can see my way clear you will hear from me again. While writing I will presume on your good nature so far as to criticize your editorial course in one respect. For my own part I am willing to co-operate with any and all Liberals, be they Theists or Atheists, in support of the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," but do you not see that when you interpose Atheism in the contest it tends to destroy harmony and to divide our forces? Would it not be better for all Liberals who are in favor of the Nine Demands to confine their attention strictly to their advocacy in discussing such matters among themselves, instead of bringing in other issues, such as Spiritualism versus Materialism, Theism versus Atheism, etc., and wasting their time and opportunities in fighting each other? Can Liberals expect to accomplish anything worthy of the cause without united and harmonious action, and can there be union and harmony while side issues are being continually thrust forward? It would seem as if there could be but one answer to these questions, and that only by the adoption of a policy suggested by the obvious answer can a satisfactory advance be made. Let us, then, ignoring among ourselves all other issues, work together, unselfishly, earnestly, zealously, and harmoniously, for liberty, justice, and equality, as outlined in the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," and look forward confidently to the glorious results which we may be well assured must in the end follow such a course.

ROBT B. JACKSON.

He Scatters Seeds of Truth.

CRAYON, O., March 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Having received a number of Freethought publications from your office this winter; having perused, weekly, the columns of the indispensable TRUTH SEEKER, and having heard the "Savior of the Century," Colonel Ingersoll, deliver his wonderful lecture at Lima, O., I feel that I have a thought to offer in this Freethought symposium.

I have had a novel experience with the members of the different religious denominations during their protracted efforts in this locality. At every opportunity I have argued and discussed our principles in public places. I have put in the hands of all who would receive them, Liberal publications of different kinds. THE TRUTH SEEKER has been shown and read to every one who would risk his presence and attention, and the consequence is, the harvest of souls has been comparatively small. In this honest and persistent work for human advancement I have brought down upon me the pious disfavor of the shepherd and his sheep. They have employed various means to counteract the telling influences of my labor by circulating copies of the Ram's Horn, making the most unwarranted assertions concerning the philosophy of Freethought, and by knowingly uttering false and disgraceful statements from the pulpit regarding the personal character of the best and noblest orators of the day.

But they die hard; and die they must, when sound philosophy and Freethought shall have broken down the barriers of superstition, ignorance, and credulity. When these relics of the Dark Ages shall have been overcome by reason, science will constitute our salvation and happiness our heaven. Then the pulpit pounder will "lose his job," and be compelled to fight the battles of life in a different and a much more creditable manner.

I must say that, up to date, in a life of thirty years, I find no evidence whatever upon which to found a belief in the existence of the Bible God, devil, hell, or heaven. Now, as I am honest in this, and have done my very best to find out the facts which compel this conclusion, am I responsible? Will an orthodox God damn me forever in the Christian's hell for not believing a dogma with a brain which he himself created? If so, what system of justice is it that condemns an individual for doing that which the condemner compelled him to do? And yet the entire Christian fabrication amounts to but this.

Regardless of isms, cisms, doctrines, or dogmas, it is my blessed privilege, and I trust that it ever shall be, to be in such a condition in life that I can think freely and express my honest thoughts.

A faithful patron, ELMER MILLER.

The Cowardice of Editors.

W. O. T. U. AND THE BIBLE.

"O Woman! How is thy intelligence fallen! Why do you defend that book? It threatens and lies from Genesis to Revelation. Its justice consists in favoritism, and its mercy culminates in a never ending hell. Your insane defense of it is the more surprising, as it nowhere states that you have a soul. By it you are made for a purpose. You live, fulfill that purpose, suffer and die, the same as the cow and the horse. Instead of giving you title in glory it plainly tells you that you are not needed in heaven. And, as I said at first, it opens with an ignorant lie and shuts up with a bigot's threat. Believe it or be damned."

LONE ROCK, OR.

MR. EDITOR: The above is the comment of one of Mrs. Unroe's listeners at Lone Rock. Please publish the same, and if you think best, send her and Francis Willard marked copies. I also wish to say, if you will be so kind as to spare me the space, a few words on the question of woman suffrage.

Taxation without representation is tyranny, and tyranny implies slavery. The appearance of slavery—I wish I could say slavery—is doomed by the eternal principles of justice. Much more so now in the case of woman than it ever was with the Negro before the war. Many of my Liberal friends are afraid of woman suffrage, or rather, they are afraid of ignorance; and being scared, they commit the foolish sin of opposing justice, weakening our cause and insuring our defeat. The preachers, not being scared, are using far better sense.

I don't think that I underestimate the seriousness of the situation. I am afraid of ignorance, and I say in the spirit of prophecy that I believe that it will be the hangman's rope that will choke liberty to death; but let's not frighten ourselves into ninnies and become a laughing stock for the Pope. Hold steady, my friends. Education is our only salvation, but if we place ourselves in opposition to justice, rightly disposed people will not hearken to our teaching.

In the 15th of December issue of the Farm and Fireside is an editorial comment on Miss Willard, from which I judge she is a very good woman, but the poor thing is grievously deluded. She advocates the government ownership of the newspapers as a reform of an evil for which that condition alone is responsible. The subsidized editor of the Farm and Fireside, being under the influence of those in authority, hasn't enough man about him, or editorial backbone, to correct her mistakes, but instead commends her ignorance.

Geo. W. CRAWFORD.

In the Valleys of Fair Wyoming.

SARATOGA, WYO., Feb. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Denver seems to have at least three very liberal preachers, who evidently mention God only once in a while, presumably in order to keep their situations, and I consider it very significant of the times that a great daily like the Denver Republican will publish both sides of the question, as it has done, in the matter of the proposed taxation of church property agitated so much lately. They have been fighting the point bitterly in the Colorado legislature. One member said very truthfully that the stones of some of our large churches were cemented with the blood of the poor. One of our own papers said that a bill to tax church property had passed our own state Senate, but I have not heard what its fate was in the House; however, I know there are a number of outspoken Liberals in that body. I will say here that the religious question has never to my knowledge been discussed in our political campaigns. No one asks what a candidate's religious opinions are, but what are his politics. Women have voted here too long to be excited over it, and go to the polls and vote as a matter of course, and, church members though they may be, and many are, vote for well-known Infidels. I was elected to the school board in our district after I had made a motion to the effect that when we hired a teacher it was to be stipulated that we were to have no religious exercises of any kind whatever, and we never do. In closing I will say that I have not been inside a church for fifteen years, and my husband has not for twenty-eight years, and we have taken the good old TRUTH SEEKER since the beginning.

FLORENCE B. JONES.

Aroused in Arizona.

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., Feb. 18, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Thinking that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER would like to hear something from Prescott, and the result of Mr. Putnam's four weeks campaign in this territory, I write you to say that the work is progressing. Mr. Putnam gave fifteen lectures in this place, including the Paine celebration—the first ever held in Arizona.

These lectures have had the effect of rousing our Christian friends from a deep sleep. There were two or three feeble attempts made by henchmen of the church to answer Mr. Putnam's lectures on the stage. Then, after the clergy thought he had left town for good, they began writing scurrilous articles for the local papers, and one gentleman even attempted to reply from his pulpit, although he had not heard a single lecture. These so-called replies from the pulpit and through the press consisted of personal abuse of Mr. Putnam, W. S. Bell, and myself. All were answered in a dignified and gentlemanly manner, and the enemy driven from the field. Still there is a lingering growl, such as you might expect. An effort to boycott some of us in business is being made, and social ostracism is carried on to a greater extent. Such conduct seems very silly, idiotic, in fact, but it is all that one can expect when one comes to consider the amount of gray matter and lucre involved.

Mr. Putnam lectured at Tempe, Tucson, and Phoenix, organizing local clubs at the two latter. Now that the fight for liberty is on, we propose to continue it to a finish. W. S. Bell is now located here, and expects to make a tour of the territory during the spring months. Then provision will be made for other lecturers, and the work prosecuted with vigor until Arizona shall be admitted to the sisterhood of states as a secular state, free from all superstitious creeds and dogmas. We appeal to every Liberal in Arizona to be brave and stand by the principles of Liberalism now. Organize and co-operate. In a united, honest effort we can accomplish much.

In Prescott we have a club, "The Prescott Freethought Federation," with one hundred members, courageous, honest men and women who have declared themselves willing to brave the insults of orthodoxy and fight for liberty and advancement. Here we are sowing the seed in good soil; it will take a little time for it to germinate and grow, and with careful cultivation we hope for a golden harvest. Our organization is growing at every meeting; volunteer recruits are still being enrolled. Mr. Putnam did the work thoroughly. He plowed deep. He is a subsoiler in Freethought. Many church members who heard his lectures were not only almost, but quite, persuaded. Some of them have retired into a non-active state. The fleshpots and threats of boycott and ostracism were too much. Still they are with us in a quiet way, and we welcome them, too. I don't blame them; it is bread and butter to remain passive. If Liberals only had a little more backbone, moral courage, or, as the preacher would say, "a little more of the grace of God," to brace them up to stand by and defend the principles of Liberalism, we would, in Arizona, at least, be in the ascendancy.

Yours truly, DR. J. MILLER.

Miscellaneous Remarks about Talmage.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Feb. 12, 295.

MR. EDITOR: Sunday, 4 P.M., February 10th, I was at the Academy of Music and listened to the widely-heard-of fiction-monger, Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage. This was indeed a departure, as ordinarily I spend the weekly holiday in reading, sleeping, or visiting friends or museums.

Theatergoers do not find it easy to harmonize the Sunday nomenclature of this theater with that of the other days of the week. Sundays at 4 P.M., the theater becomes a house, and seats pews, the stage a platform, the auditors sheep, and the clown or star a D.D. The naturalness of six days of the week disappears and there is substituted a hazy tension in the people's feelings and minds, which fits them for treason, stratagem, and spoils. The Christian religion is all right, providing people properly consider it as farce comedy, though too often tragic. When in the haze of imagination, if one allows himself or herself to become lost to all reason and merely wrapped in sentimentality, then religion is despicable, but when considered as a variety of amusement merely to pass the time away, then it is all right to sing "Praise God from whom all blessings flow," and listen to the fancy sketches of the preachers. The Christian religion is merely a device, a counterfeit, a shroud, a fraud; offered to a race that would rather do almost anything else than work to supply their physical needs; hence Christianity asks the question, "What does it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" No man can gain more than a little portion of the whole world, but every person loses his soul at death.

As expected, the doctor conducted himself in a gentlemanly manner, and aside from the broad lesson of brotherhood running through his discourse, it contained no more substance than a vat of skimmed milk. In personal appearance he does not quite so much as usual remind one of the evolution theory, owing to the disappearance of hair from his cheeks. The doctor announces that he is good for twenty years yet, so the inference is that he is merely holding out against time.

Policemen attend Talmage's meetings in official capacity. Instead of guns standing about the place of worship as in Puritanical days, now there are hired guardians of the peace with firearms in their pockets. The payment of twenty-five cents, however, admits of entrance at a side door to a front seat, thus avoiding the crowd and danger of having the pockets picked.

After "our friend, the artist," as the preacher refers to his cornetist, had stood the audience up and set it down again by a combination wave of the arm and hand, of which he only is master, the doctor announced his text from John, "Other sheep have I which are not of this fold." It was a commendable effort on account of its scope of salvation, and if more such sermons were preached we would be more thoroughly bound together into a universal brotherhood. His ideas were so broad that he anticipated that finally even Freethinkers will be gobbled into the same fold with the sheep. The pope invites Protestants to turn from their heresy and seek refuge in the only true fold, the Catholic; while the hope of Infidels is to more thoroughly regenerate Catholic, Protestant, Mohammedan, and pagan alike. Contrary to nature, the sheep for the most part remained silent, while the shepherd did the bleating.

The doctor made the startling statement that he has all of his life been asking "Why?" and if rightly understood, immediately after birth he asked, "Why?"

It is evident that his Brooklyn flock has grown weary of shelling, and now he has taken a new start, in a new way. Unable to build still another church, he proposes to permanently appropriate a place of amusement. All Infidels, as well as fairies of the stage, should pray, each to the god of his or her own choice, that this beautiful Academy of Music may be spared from flames about vacation time. The Catholic church has a strong hold upon the theater, with the Jews a close second. The number of Irish shows and songs proves this statement. A long-faced Calvinist, of course, would not seek to drive the Catholics and Jews from the theaters, but it is difficult to see why such a light and fanciful divine as Talmage should object to support from the patrons of the stage.

L. D. CRINE.

Don't Let the Priest Get You at Death.

RIDGEWAY, N. Y., March 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Thirty-four years ago I settled at this place. There was then and still is a Universalist society and church building in the village (which is a small hamlet) and is the only church building here.

At that time I had progressed from an early orthodox education to the Universalist interpretation of the scriptures, and I sought a location and home here largely influenced by the presence of the "liberal society." I took an active part in the support of the society for many years. I was "honored" with the position of standing clerk of the Niagara Association of Universalists for twelve to fifteen years, until I had "evolved" from "liberal" or Universalist Christianity up to the plane of Freethought, when I tendered my resignation as standing clerk, some eight or ten years ago. (The standing clerk holds his office during the pleasure of the association or until it is vacated by removal, death, or resignation.)

This locality has had the name of being "liberal." J. E. Remsburg has lectured here twice to very small audiences, although his meetings were well advertised and the weather favorable on both occasions. At one lecture two only of the regular supporters of the society were present, and at the other only one.

As "liberal" as they are (the Universalists) none seems in favor of the taxation of church property or is willing to sign a petition for the repeal of our Sunday laws, although of about one hundred people who live in this school district at least sixty I have no doubt have laid themselves liable to fines or imprisonment within the last year for violation of the Sunday laws. I got four signatures to the petitions you sent me and became discouraged and gave them to a Seventh Day Adventist, and every adult man and woman of their society (I think) signed the petitions, some twelve to sixteen or more, and I forwarded them to our representative in the assembly, Hon. George Bullard, and Senator C. W. Pound. Mr. Pound acknowledged the receipt and said it was the only petition he had received for repeal of Sunday laws, but he had got thousands of names against repeal and some for more rigid Sunday laws. He said he would present the petition to the committee, and I see by the daily papers he did so, and, as I understood, it is the only petition for the repeal of the Sunday laws as yet presented. The Sunday laws are a dead letter here, but if they should be enforced I have no doubt it would rouse public sentiment against them. I think it will take something of that character to stir people to any action. I think it would be hard to convict before a jury for "Sabbath-breaking," as it would be difficult to draw a jury of which at least one-half were not "Sabbath-breakers" themselves. Let us not be discouraged. Public sentiment is slowly but surely turning toward Freethought.

By the way, several of your correspondents, in mentioning that splendid book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," have expressed themselves as pleased with the definition of Freethought as given in the opening chapter. I mention this to ask you to copy it for the benefit of your readers who are not fortunate enough to have the privilege of reading it in the book.

I have made several attempts to get some subscribers for you in this "liberal" community, but without success. Judging from my own observation and experience, the "liberal Christians" are nearly if not quite the equals of the regular "orthodox Christians" when it comes to the question of "bigotry," pure and simple. The society here has recently hired a minister to preach one-half of the time. Two weeks ago I wrote him a letter respectfully asking him to give his views of the passages of scripture where the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and the miracles in connection therewith, ending with the catastrophe to his hosts in the Red sea. Also to reconcile the Mosaic account of creation with scientific facts. Also to give his opinion of the higher criticism of the Bible, as touched upon in the Briggs trial and controversy, and I promised to go and hear him if he would announce his subject. My daughter has just returned from meeting and she says he made no announcement nor any allusion whatever to the matter, so I suppose he has not the courage to discuss such "live subjects," and I expect he will keep on threshing out the old straw of proving universal salvation from the "holy scriptures."

I do not think I could name a man or woman who is a regular attendant and supporter of the society who would dare to take THE TRUTH SEEKER from the post-office and be known as a regular subscriber if you would send it free.

I am sorry that you still see fit to allow the discussion of economic questions, finance, protection, and free trade, in your paper. The two articles in the last paper on these subjects, I must say, contain more assertions and assumptions entirely without foundation in fact, from my point of view, than any newspaper articles I remember reading lately. They do not change my opinion in the least, nor do I think a reply would change the opinions of the writers a particle, and I again respectfully enter my protest against lowering the plane of the discussions in your columns below the discussions of morals and the general principles involved in the "Nine Demands."

I have in the past and shall in the future sacrifice partisan associations on economic questions when I go to the polls whenever they conflict in political action with the "Nine Demands." I desire to say that I have written out a short statement of my opinions on ethical subjects, and made arrangements, and given directions in writing, that my funeral shall be secular, that no priest or clergyman shall assist in the services, that my statement of opinions shall be a part of the services, and that the proceeding shall be sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication. My family promises me that my wishes shall be carried out if they survive me. I made these arrangements some two and a half years ago. I do not know of any secular funerals being held nearer to this place than New York city, and I suppose it may be difficult to make a start of that kind in this locality. I hold myself in readiness to cooperate and assist at any secular funeral in Western New York when my services may be desired. I think I could conduct such services acceptably. I think Freethinkers owe it to themselves to establish the custom of secular burials and not allow the votaries of superstition to conduct a farce over their dead bodies. Let every Freethinker who thinks as I do, who reads this, make such arrangements as I have in writing, and do it now, before he is a week older.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Call from a Sea-Shell Horn.

The larkspur blew her speckled shell
To call me out one summer morn;
A lark was singing at the well;
The red-rose bloomed along the corn.

Wild-peas shook out their crimson sails
While floating by to fairy-land;
The blue-bells warmed the windy gales—
The "man-root" blossom kissed my hand.

Catalpa trees, in white array,
Made room for mother-birds below,
And wild canaries came that way
As golden lamps on bows of snow.

Small grasses set their silver stars
As though the sun was nearing noon;
My stately rosin-weed had bars
That balanced to the red-start's tune.

A flower whose heart was just a burr
Stood high and smoothed her yellow hair;
The pale blue violets bowed to her,
Since she had gorgeous robes to wear.

The flaming dock had pink balloons
As buttons on a sailor's vest,
And hid through all the whispering Junes
Some ground-bird in her lowly nest.

The blue-grass mat 'neath cherry-tree
Invited me within the shade,
And, while I rested, sang to me
The changes ten short years had made.

That forest space was then a plain
With buffalo and antelope,
That when the "whites" brought bees and rain,
Went with the red-men o'er the slope.

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

"The 'man-root' plant I have never seen excepting in northern Nebraska. It grows a great root resembling a beet, and I have been told by reliable persons that it attains a size corresponding to the body of a man. It blooms the third year from planting the seed. The blossom is a deep crimson cup that opens and closes like the morning-glory. I had one plant in my yard in Nebraska, and sent seeds to Aunt Elmina, who will probably have some soon to send to her friends.
The Indians have said the white man brought the bees and rain."

A Dispute.

Tom and Joe quarreled,
I've heard people tell,
About a queer animal
Hid in a shell.

"I tell you it walks, sir!"
Said Tommy to Joe.

"It swims!" cried Joe loudly.

"I've seen, and I know!"

"It walks!" "No, it swims!"
And the boys grew quite wroth,
But the turtle peeped out,
Saying, "I can do both!"

A little girl in Gorman, on first discovering the electric lights, and seeing the moon at the same time, propounded this conundrum:

"Mamma, does God know that we have got electric lights?"

"Yes," replied the mother, "he must know it, because he knows everything."

"Then, mamma, why don't he take in the moon?"

Correspondence.

CANON CITY, COL., Feb. 22, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Despite the prophecy that Washington's birthday would be one of the coldest days of the season, it is lovely in the extreme. The surrounding mountains, in the lucid air and dazzling sunlight, are glorious. Save for the absence of bursting buds and shooting grass, it is a spring day. The birds are chirping far and near, and a friendly bee, which—with its companions—has been awaiting spring, is happy making melody to my ear.

I attend to most of my correspondence Sundays and holidays. I shall spend a part of this one with my Corner friends. We are supposed to observe this day in remembrance of the Vanderbilt of his time, "our own" George Washington. Only yesterday I heard, at one of these observances, the expression: "He is all our own." You can imagine my feelings of gratitude that I should be a shareholder in such a legacy. I fear, however, that, through modern modes of speculation, the stock has been slightly watered.

We were amused at Geo. Macdonald's "Observations" in last week's TRUTH SEEKER regarding that individual who, according to the latest information I have been able to obtain, will occupy a reserved seat in the New Jerusalem. My informant is a man of "Christian sincerity." He spoke in a manner calculated to impress his audience with the assurance that he was speaking "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The speaker was a man of no previous note. He made a revelation, however, that, so far as this affiant can testify, has never before been made to the world. Permit me to explain. It was on the occasion of a school celebration of the birthday of this same George Washington. There had been rehearsed a number of time-magnified reviews of his life, of which he undoubtedly would have been proud had he been present. At the close of these reviews of the noble character and god-like virtues of that angelic personage who "never told a lie," the teacher extended a general invitation to the visitors present. Several responded. One or two speeches were made regarding the best method of climbing the "ladder of knowledge." It was also shown how bravely, and with what agility, the little George had stepped from one round to the next. However, the climax was not reached until there emerged from obscurity this candidate for fame who had never before been known to "speak in public on the stage," except in "experience meetings." All were electrified. Silence reigned supreme. After building numerous castles of virtue about the memory of his hero, assuming an air of ministerial dignity, he exclaimed: "George Washington was the greatest man who ever lived, except Jesus Christ." This revelation, as I have termed it, may seem to some a small matter. However, when we consider the vast possibilities thereof, we will see its importance as also the importance of the celebration. The "father of his country," being next to the greatest man who ever lived, will certainly be permitted to occupy next to the greatest seat ever occupied by man. The world has long been in possession of a picture—wholly imaginary—in which God—the old Jewish Jehovah—is the central figure. At his left hand is the Holy Ghost (whoever or whatever that may mean); at his right, his only son, Jesus Christ. Now, at the right hand of Christ is the "father of his country." This is of particular importance to "Infidels," as well as to all others who may be the lucky stockholders in this inestimable boon. If we, as a nation, observe regularly, carefully, prayerfully this birthday which will, "no preventing providence," "come again next year at the same time," as well as for some succeeding years, he—our national father—sitting at the right hand may, peradventure, put a bug in the right ear of "Our Savior." In this event our "calling and election" is sure. I am, for strategy, Yours, ORELLA LOCKE.

P.S.—I do not wish to underrate the good that Washington did, but merely make this criticism as an illustration of the manner in which enthusiasts enlarge upon his good deeds, and overlook or obliterate what others did. We should give him his deserved praise, but we should not forget others, of whom I will mention Thomas Paine and Thomas Jefferson.

Yours for justice, O. L.

BALLWIN, MO., Feb. 26, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it has been quite a while since I wrote to the Corner, I will try to write again. The snow is just melting off. It has been on the ground for four long weeks, and I am glad to see it go. I like the spring best. Wheat, corn, potatoes, and fruits are the chief products of St. Louis county. We live just twenty miles from St. Louis; we go in every week. We live on a farm of 120 acres. The nearest town is a mile and a half from us. We live on a very high hill, and have a fine view and can see St. Louis from our porch. The Merimac river is just a mile and a half from our place. We go skating in winter and boating in summer. It is a very pretty river in summer with its little green islands, large willows overhanging its banks, and the red bluffs towering above, with now and then a stray cedar sticking in some crevice. We have a miniature waterfall on our farm; it is just lovely in the spring, its banks covered with moss, ferns, and violets. They have just finished a fine Catholic church near us, while the poor, ignorant Dutch women wear rags and wooden shoes, when they might have decent dresses and shoes were it not that they give their money to the church.

Well, as my letter is getting rather long I will close. Yours for Liberalism, COBA LANE.

P.S.—I would be delighted to have any of the boys or girls of the Corner write to me—P. O. box 15.

[Cora's home must be in a lovely spot, and Cora must be a bright and lovely girl, from whom we shall always be pleased to hear.—Ed. C. C.]

IMAGINATION IN DREAMS AND THEIR STUDY.
By Frederick Greenwood. London: John Lane. New York: Macmillan & Co. Cloth, 12mo., 198 pp. Price, $1.75.
This volume is intended to be a study of dreams which are "psychologically informing, or that testify to the powers of imagination in sleep." The author thinks that there will be no difficulty in "distinguishing between dreams that have a scientific interest and those that have none, or, if there be any difficulty," this work may serve to diminish it. It is conceded that the imagination cannot portray what has not been seen by the eye, or entered into the channel of the senses through the reading of books, the contemplation of pictures, or by means of conversation. In all the imaginings concerning "heaven" which have been given to the world there has been nothing pictured that was not the counterpart of some thing or the combination of two or more things known on this earth. "Imagination in Dreams" is apparently written in an unprejudiced spirit and no doubt will be found to be interesting and suggestive.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, 1895, aside from its calendar of events bearing relation to Liberalism, contains an elaborate review of "Freethought in the United States;" a paper, "The Old and the New," by Robert G. Ingersoll, contrasts the past and present in religious belief; Helen H. Gardener asks, "What Are Women Here For?" Samuel P. Putnam tells of "The Freethought Federation of America," and other papers in a similar vein characterize the contents. The Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette Place, N. Y.—Omaha Bee.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clasp-trap, but only in WISDOM—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease, learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, inspired by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. 141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. Albert M. Lorentz, LL.B., in a recent publication by the Truth Seeker Company, attempts to prove that "The pursuit of pleasure is the sine qua non of intellectual, moral, and social development, and that the promotion of pleasure is the duty of philanthropy and statesmanship." The book is called "Pleasure and Progress," and handles some social practices without gloves, the author upholding the theory that all legislation regarding morality is wasted time, that men should be persuaded to do right because it is easier and pleasanter than to do wrong.—Omaha Bee.

QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

COLUMBIAS FOR 1895.

A Highly Artistic Catalogue Sets Forth the Merits of These Famous Bicycles.

Noted artists occasionally condescend to lend their aid to make a trade catalogue beautiful, and this has evidently been the case with the new handbook of Columbia bicycles, just issued. From the rich and striking cover to the last of the dainty sketches that adorn the broad margins, the tell-tale marks that show the hand of well-known contributors to Life, Vogue, and the leading magazines are everywhere apparent. The idea skillfully carried out in the illustrations is that of sport and travel. The book will long be preserved as one of the handsomest art works of the year. It is as little like the ordinary trade catalogue as well can be, and yet it cleverly tells of the merits of Columbia bicycles for 1895, and also of lower-priced machines, Hartfords. No lover of bicycling or of beautiful books should neglect sending for the Columbia Catalogue. It can be had by calling upon Columbia agents, or it will be sent by mail for two 2-cent stamps. Not for Parsons.

A FEW Sundays ago a clergyman in Ireland made the following announcement: "Next Sunday, in this church, the Rev. Mr. — will renounce the errors of Rome for those of Protestantism."

"I WAS sorry, Willie," said his Sunday-school teacher, "to see you keep your seat when the superintendent asked all those who wanted to go to heaven to rise. Don't you want to go to heaven?" "Yes'm." "Then why didn't you rise?" "Cos he didn't hav no right to tell me to rise, ma'am," answered Willie. "He ain't no angel Gabriel."

At the sacrament a priest gave, without perceiving it, a bone counter instead of the wafer. The communicant, thinking it would melt, patiently waited and sucked, but without effect. The priest, seeing him hesitate, inquired what was the matter. "Matter," said he, "I hope your reverence has not made a mistake and given me God the Father? He is so hard and tough there is no swallowing him."

"I DO wish we had not made this trip," said the candid daughter of a Texas millionaire, who had taken his family to the Holy Land; I always used to dream of Palestine as a land where strange things might have happened, because it was so far away and perhaps so different from home. But these weeds just look like sage brush and—excuse the remark—these 'hares' are just like our Bastrop county jack rabbits." The Oriental Isis, unveiled, reveals many propensities of a Cook county medium.—Felix L. Oswald, in Open Court.

"SWEAR AT 'EM, DANIEL." One of the early ministers of Windham, notwithstanding his manifold duties, owned and cultivated a large farm, on which he gave constant employment to several hands, and he usually looked after the details in person, but, when unable to do so, his chief factotum was one Daniel —, a hard-working, faithful fellow, and "a mighty hunter by field and flood," but devotedly attached to the parson, for whose interest he labored early and late a long term of years.

He had, however, one habit which greatly annoyed his employer—he was terribly profane. Many and solemn were the rebukes administered by the parson, but all to no purpose; swear he would and swear he did on the slightest provocation, and the good minister almost despaired of his reformation.

Now, the story goes that his reverence at one time owned a yoke of oxen that often refused to pull at the most critical moment, and on such occasions they were sure to be treated to a well-selected assortment of Daniel's choicest oaths, which, he maintained, always accelerated their locomotion.

One day as the parson sat quietly conning his next Sunday's sermon, he heard a tremendous outcry in the direction of his hayfield.

Going to the door to ascertain the cause, he saw that a shower was rapidly approaching, while a big load of hay, slowly wending its way to the barn, was in imminent danger of being caught by the coming rain, and Daniel, as he frantically urged on the balky team, was making the air tremulous with his blasphemy.

This was too much for the good man to bear. He left his study, and with rapid strides soon reached the scene, when he courteously ordered Daniel to stop his awful profanity. "But," replied the veteran, "if I don't swear these oxen won't pull."

The parson expressed a most unqualified disbelief in the statement, and taking the good stick, he addressed the team in a calm, easy manner. They stopped short, and refused to budge another inch. He still continued in his mild, persuasive strain, but they simply gazed in apparent astonishment at such an unwonted state of affairs. What was to be done at this critical juncture?

The black clouds mounted higher and higher in the heavens, the lightning flashed brighter and brighter along the ragged edges of the storm, the thunder rolled nearer and nearer each moment, the wind sighed fitfully among the neighboring tree tops, and already a few big drops heralded the coming tempest. Still the oxen stood as if rooted to the spot.

This was past endurance, and dropping the good stick, his reverence shouted, "Daniel, Daniel, come and swear at them a little easy, a little easy, now, Daniel!"

What followed verifies the old adage: "Give some men an inch and they will take an ell," for, with a muttered "I told you so!" the teamster sprang to the side of his team, and, wild y flourishing a pitchfork over their heads, he let loose a torrent of the most horrible profanity ever heard within the limits of the township, the result of which was that the cattle gazed a moment as if in fear, and then starting on the run, landed the load safely in the barn just as the shower came down in earnest; and it is also stated the minister never again admonished his teamster in regard to his language.—Samuel T. Dole, in Narragansett Sun.

PIANOS! PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STROCK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies,	$1.00
Fifty copies,	4.50
One hundred copies,	8.00

Gems of Thought.

We lie to our children—in the interests of morality.—Grant Allen.

An infinitude of tenderness is the chief gift and inheritance of all truly great men.—John Ruskin.

I do not believe even eye-witnesses when they tell me things opposed to common sense.—Voltaire.

A MAN is to carry himself in the presence of all opposition as if everything were titular and ephemeral but he.—R. W. Emerson.

Those who have not a strong sense of what is just to themselves, are likewise deficient in a sense of what is just to their fellow-men. This has long been a common remark.—Herbert Spencer.

In art, and in literature, the morality that is eloquent for ideals and opulent with valiant inspirations, often asks for bread in vain and falls into a neglected grave. Servility to popular idols "pays" better.—Amos Waters.

WHAT strange rage possesses some people to insist on our all being miserable? They are like a quack, who would fain have us believe we are ill, in order to sell us his pills. Keep thy drugs, my friend, and leave me my health.—Voltaire.

VOTES may have only immediate significance, and legislation may be gross as well as virtuous, and only a passing and awkward factor in racial growth, but it shows the flow of the stream, and hints of the conscience of a nation.—Horace L. Traubel.

To attack the king was treason; to dispute the priest was blasphemy. For many centuries the sword and cross were allies. Together they attacked the rights of man. They defended each other. The throne and the altar were twins—two vultures from the same egg.—Ingersoll.

By the death of Frederick Douglass, one of the most romantic and heroic characters of this age has passed away. Of all the men who have risen out of obscurity into prominence in this country, he has traveled the longest way, passing from slavery to a greatness that was international. His memory will be long cherished. He himself is the conclusiv answer to the narrow logic of the lover of caste and the advocate of race injustice.—Unity.

WHENCE the influence of our churches? By what agency have they awed the masses into silence, and even thrones into obedience? By what means have they succeeded in sowing sectarianism, setting man against his fellow, and threatening eternal infamy to all who would not kneel at their dark and dominant shrine? The Bible! Faith in the supernatural origin of that book is the secret source of priestly ascendancy throughout Christendom. While that delusion prevails there is no hope for freedom in Europe.—Robert Cooper.

If we judge of men by what they have done, then Voltaire is incontestably the greatest writer of modern Europe. No [other] one has caused, through the powerful influence of his genius alone and the perseverance of his will, so great a commotion in the minds of men. His pen aroused a sleeping world, and shook a far mightier empire than that of Charlemagne, the European empire of a theocracy. His genius was not force, but light. Wherever he trod, light followed him, for Reason—which is light—had destined him to be, first her poet, then her apostle, and lastly her idol.—Lamartine.

THERE are some ugly chapters in English history connected with attempts to suppress conviction, to throttle its expression under pretense of its being wicked or immoral. But we are so far away from those eras that many hardly remember their lesson; which is a pity, for such lessons are costly, and, if forgotten, can sometimes only be recovered at a heavier cost. The lesson taught by every effort to repress honest and public discussion of any subject whatever is that all such efforts are revolutionary. Every honest man in prison is tenfold more dangerous than fire burning near fire-damp. The majesty of law is defiled when the innocent are punished deliberately with the guilty.—Moncure D. Conway.

SYMPATHY may become so insistent a motif, so imperious in its demand for satisfaction, that the heart must needs comply as if it were obeying an ethical hunger. The starving man will rob in order to still his craving, and the soul which is stirred by the generous current of pity for misfortune will rob itself of ease and possessions in order, through the gloom of self-sacrifice, to win relief for the sufferer and inner peace for itself. The process is as natural as breathing, or clothing one's body. No celestial force is required to set it going. No divine code is needed to direct it. The reign of sympathy must be established by the efforts of those men and women who are endowed with the most abundant share of its saving grace.—F. J. Gould.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers.

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. GALVESTON has at last secured deep water in her harbor. The Pilot's Association officially announces that there are now 18 feet on the bar. It means much to Galveston and to the West and Northwest.

GEORGE DYE, white, living at Athens, Ga., died two years ago, leaving $125,000 to seven illegitimate Negro children. The will was contested, but the third trial, just concluded, resulted in a decision in favor of the legatees.

In the London County Council Mr. Arnold (Progressive) was elected chairman over the Duke of Norfolk, who is thus described: Sir Henry Fitzalan Howard, K. G., Duke of Norfolk, Earl of Arundel, Surrey and Norfolk. Baron Fitz-Alan, Clun, Oswaldestre and Maltravers, Earl Marshal and Hereditary Marshal of England, is Premier Duke immediately after the Princes of the Blood Royal, and is Premier Earl. His pedigree is traced to Saxon origin.

THE Spanish cruiser Reina Regenta foundered off the Morocco coast during a gale last week. She had a crew of 420 officers and men, all of whom are supposed to have been lost. She had just conveyed the returning Moorish mission to Tangier, and on March 10 left that port for Cadiz.

A TERRIBLY destructive hurricane swept over the Fiji islands. On one island the coconut plantations will need five years to recover. On Taveuni, where most of the European planters are settled, about everything has been destroyed. Famine and pestilence are said to be sure to follow.

EVERYTHING portable in Poe's cottage at Fordham, in the annexed district of New York, has been carried away by the vandals who have had the key to examine it under pretext of wanting to buy it. The property has just passed into the possession of Dr. Edward Chauvet, a dentist, who will use it for an office.

THERE was a small riot in the Indiana House of Representatives growing out of a concerted attempt to prevent Governor Matthew's private secretary from delivering to the speaker just before the hour of final adjournment a veto message from the governor. The secretary was badly injured and is in some danger of death.

OVER $400,000 worth of property was destroyed by a fire in Kansas City on March 13. The buildings burned included those occupied by the English Supply Company, the Western Newspaper Union, and the Great Western Type Foundry. The Newspaper Union supplied patent insides for 200 weekly newspapers.

THE coroner's jury sitting to inquire into the cause of the death of the four persons killed by the collapse of the Orchard street tenement in this city (which fell while in course of construction), brings in a verdict severely censuring the owner of the building, the two builders, and several of the officials of the Building Department of the city.

THE New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad Company expects to have its branch line from Boston to Nantasket Beach equipped with electric motors in place of steam by June 1. If the experiment proves a success the change from steam to electricity will gradually be made on other branches and eventually on the main line between New Haven and New York.

THERE are bad reports from two state institutions. One is the State Home for Juvenile Female Offenders in Chicago, from which two assistant matrons have just resigned, alleging inhuman treatment of the girls by the matron. They charge that she has tried to starve, beat, and chain the culprits into subjection. The other institution of which complaint is made is the State Asylum for the Insane at St. Peter, Minn. There are about 1,000 inmates, while there are accommodations for only 700. In many of the rooms the ventilation is very bad, the sanitary arrangements of the kitchen are defective, and often female patients are obliged to sleep in the corridors. The condition of things is charged to the niggardly policy of the state.

A MARVELOUS gold find is reported in Western Australia. It is said that nuggets weighing as much as 150 ounces have been picked up and a "mountain" of gold-bearing quartz discovered. A party of miners confessed to the butchery of a village of blacks, men, women, and children being slaughtered. Many of the prospectors are brought back raging with fever.

A SPANISH brigantine fired on the American merchant ship Alliance as she was passing Cuba on her way from Colon to New York, but instead of obeying the command to stop and explain the captain put on all steam and left the Spanish ship in the rear. Now Secretary Gresham has asked the government of Spain to disavow the unauthorized act of its war vessel and give strict orders that American shipping shall not in future be molested while no state of war is admitted by the Spanish government to exist in Cuba.

UNITED STATES CONSUL MEEKER at Bradford, Eng., reports to the State Department that some grades of American-made cloths are selling in England under the prices charged for similar English-made cloths. He states that one large Bradford firm has sent its traveling men and agents into Italy, India, South America, and France with samples of twist melange flannel and Algiers cloth made in the United States, and the New York manufacturers were informed that if the samples were exact large orders might be expected.

THE electrical laboratory of Nicola Tesla, at 35 South Fifth ave., this city, was totally destroyed by fire on March 13. His money loss is $50,000, but this is as nothing compared to the loss of the time and discoveries embodied in the apparatus burned. He had demonstrated that poly-phase currents of high potency, even to 250,000 volts, may pass through the human body without harming it. He has discovered a means to transmit electricity without a wire and expected to produce a light as powerful as sunshine as soon as he had ascertained how to care safely for the 8,000,000 volts necessary for that purpose. There was no insurance on the machinery. Mr. Tesla came to this country from Serbia about ten years ago.

THE unemployed of New York are to be given a chance to cultivate vacant lots and tracts of land in the city and its vicinity during the coming season. The example was set at Detroit last year, under the direction of Mayor Pingree. Bolton Hall has been appointed by the Charities conference to carry out the plan here. The intention is to supply the tillers with seed and guidance so that they can become largely self-supporting without the stigma of being paupers. Mr. Wm. Steinway, Ex-Mayor Hewitt, and Columbia College have offered tracts of land for use in the experiment, and it is expected that many other owners will do so. There are vacant lots aggregating more than 1,000 acres below West One Hundred and Forty-fifth street and the Harlem river, and in the annexed district there are thousands of acres. Of course the land offered is rent free to Mr. Hall and his associates.

THERE have been serious riots in New Orleans during the past week. White rioters shot down a large number of Negro workmen on the levee. Heavy fogs prevailed and the police were powerless. One British subject was dangerously wounded in the head by a bullet. The whites and Negroes are all union men, but there are separate unions for the two races and the Negroes work for less wages than do the others. While the local and state authorities were for a time dilatory in attempts to enforce order the Council of the Commercial bodies issued an address calling for the protection of all workmen, regardless "of race, color, or previous condition," and also resolved to ask the United States government to intervene for the protection of life, and it was not until the governor appeared and promised to do all possible to restore order that the resolution was rescinded. Troops were called and the colored workers resumed their duties under guard.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

THE WORLD AS THE SABBATARIANS WOULD HAV IT.

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

What the Church Wants.

Rev. Mr. Foster, speaking in the Boston theocratic convention, said that the Christian amendment to the Constitution should be adopted in order to bring about these results, among others:

"I. To bring that instrument into harmony with the history, character, and life of this nation." [That is, to legalize the unconstitutional legislation which the church has forced the nation, the states, and the municipalities to enact.] "II. It is an act of homage which this nation owes to the King of kings." [In other words, it would give the clergy more power.] "III. A secular Constitution will secularize the nation." [And make the common citizen equal in rights to the minister.] "IV. A secular Constitution exposes the nation to the judicial inflictions of divine wrath. V. A constitutional recognition of Christ and his law would furnish a basis for moral legislation."

Ah, that is so, no doubt. We know what you call "moral legislation." Reading what you say under this last head we find that the "moral legislation" that the adoption of this proposed amendment would give us includes the judicial oath so formulated as to shut out all but Christians from office, the use of the Bible in all the schools of the land, the stoppage of Sunday mails and the enactment of Sabbath laws to shut everything but churches on Sunday, and the nationalization of "Christ's law of divorce." In plain words, the passage of religious laws under the name of "moral legislation"! We ask the friends of religious liberty to read what we reproduce below from the address of Mr. Foster; to read it a score of times and then transcribe it into their note books and always have it at hand to show to Christians who deny that the theocratic party would make this a government of Christians, for Christians, and by Christians:

"This amendment would include the law: 'Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God and swear by his name.' The Constitution provides that no religious test shall be required as a qualification for office or trust. Justice Story says this means that 'the pagan, Mohammedan, Jew, Christian, and Infidel shall sit down in common at the table of our national councils.' The friends and enemies of Christ are eligible to office. This amendment would require that voters choose out from their number 'able men, men of truth, such as fear God and hate covetousness [Quay, for instance] and place such to be rulers over' them. Eight years after the adoption of the Constitution, Congress made a treaty with Tripoli, which has never been called in question as to its constitutionality. It says: 'The government of the United States is in no sense founded on the Christian religion and makes no distinction between the Christian and the Mussulman.' This amendment would effectually repudiate that sentence. In 1808 President Jefferson was petitioned to proclaim a fast by New England ministers. He replied: 'I consider the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises.' This amendment would remove that interdiction."

The italics are ours. Here we find it deliberately proclaimed that the theocrats intend to debar all citizens who are not Christians from participation in the affairs of state, and that after they seize the reins of power the government will intermeddle with religious institutions, "their doctrines, discipline, and exercises." And yet these schemers have the effrontery to say that they are opposed to the union of church and state and to complain of the intermeddling of the Catholic church in governmental concerns!

Mr. Gladstone's Absurdities.

In his article in McClure's Magazine on the "Lord's Day" England's ex-Premier, referring to the declaration of a leading Jewish speaker at the World's Fair Parliament of Religions that the strict Mosaisms could not accept a first-day Sabbath, says:

"We can; and the authority which is on our side has also reason at its back. The old Sabbath was the festival of rest from labor with the hand; a festival of the body, of natural life, a festival negativ in its character, for its fundamental conception was simply a conception of what man was not to do."

Was the old Sabbath a festival of rest from labor or was it a festival commemorative of deliverance from slavery? Which reason for the establishment of the Sabbath does Mr. Gladstone accept—that given in Exodus or the one we find in Deuteronomy? Manifestly he cannot have both, for they are flatly contradictory and mutually destructive. It would appear from the text of his argument that he has chosen the one that has nothing but a legend behind it, for he seems to pin his faith to Exodus. This is just like Mr. Gladstone—if he has to choose between a natural and easy solution of a theological problem and a solution that is strained, unnatural, and incapable of being successfully defended with the weapons of logic and common sense, he will be sure to select the latter. Judging from the best evidence at our command, the Jews did not have a weekly Sabbath until after the return of those who had been in captivity among the Babylonians. They had imbibed new ideas during their captivity, and among these ideas was that of a weekly festival or day of worship and rest. It was perfectly natural that they should commemorate their deliverance from bondage in the way stated in Deuteronomy. But this is altogether too simple for Mr. Gladstone. It at once eliminates the supernatural element from the Sabbath ordinance and leaves it upon a purely human basis, and, by direct inference, absolves the "Gentiles" from observance of the day, for, if it was established to commemorate the deliverance of the Jews from subjection to an alien power, it is clearly of immediate interest to Jews only, and no moral or patriotic obligation rests upon others to do homage to it or rest from labor thereon. To claim that we should be fined and imprisoned for failing to observe a day set apart to keep fresh in the memory of Jews the fact that some tribes of their ancestors at a certain time escaped from slavery, could be counterparted in absurdity and injustice only by the analogous claim that the people of Germany and France should be fined and imprisoned for failing to observe the Fourth of July, a day set apart by Americans to commemorate the release of the Colonies from political subjection to Great Britain. As it is, even inhabitants of the United States are not punished if they engage in work or recreation on the nation's natal day, while a score or more of them are lying at this moment in jail because, while they want to observe the Jewish Sabbath only, they have worked on a day which the Christian church fraudulently substituted for the former, and which it declares we must reverence because, as it asserts, another day was set aside by the Jews and their tutelar divinity as a Sabbath!

Mr. Gladstone prefers to take his Sabbath on the authority of the exploded six-days' creation myth, and, of course, becomes hopelessly entangled. If the old Sabbath was a festival of rest from labor with the hand, was it such because God rested from the work of creation as asserted in Exodus? Mr. Gladstone must answer, Yes, or deny the truth of that portion of the Bible which he accepts as his authority for the Sabbath. This leads directly to the further question—Did God work with his hands? If he did, what becomes of his asserted infinity? If he has the physical parts of a man, including hands, has he not also the mental and moral limitations of a man? We are astonished that Mr. Gladstone should aver that the ordinance of his God establishing a Sabbath was in its "fundamental conception" "simply a conception of what man was not to do," that is, that the Sabbath was "negativ in its character." How can there be degrees of excellence in the commands of a being infinite in power and goodness? How can Mr. Gladstone, poor worm of the dust, venture to qualify the works of his god? The cause of his apparent "blasphemy" is plainly seen—he is clearing the way for his argument that a greater sanctity attaches to Sunday than to Saturday; he is engaged in a sly attempt to exalt the first day of the week at the expense of the seventh; he wants to show that Constantine was, in his time, in the confidence of God, and in order to do this he is willing to minimize the importance of the revelation given by that god to the unknown writer of Exodus. This will appear from what follows:

"The festival of the new life! Not merely the act of our Lord's rising, which has for its counterpart the act of the Creator's resting; but of the life, and the employments of the life, which in his resurrection body he then began. Here comes into view a point not only of difference, but of contrast. The fourth commandment enjoined not a life, but a death; and all that may now be thought to require a living observance of the day is not read in, but (as the lawyers say) read into it. But the celebration of the Lord's Day is the unsealing of a fountain-head, a removal of the grave-clothes from the man found to be alive, the opening of a life spontaneous and continuous."

The latter part of that reads quite prettily, but that is all that can be said for it. We are concerned, however, with Mr. Gladstone's unblushing avowal that all associated with the fourth commandment which may now be thought to require a living observance of the Sabbath is read into it instead of being an inseparable part of it. His assertion amounts to a declaration that the modern Protestant reverences the Sabbath, or should reverence it, only because it was the custom of some of the early Christians to meet on Sunday to celebrate the alleged resurrection of Jesus. In other words, Mr. Gladstone, the Protestant protagonist, throws aside the Protestant authority, the Bible, and accepts that of the Catholic church, that is, tradition. This is another straw showing the swift drift Rome-ward of reactionary Protestantism, which is every day growing more willing to rest all its chances for temporal salvation on the law-enforced observance of the Catholic Sunday. The Catholic has never been as fanatical as the Puritan regarding Sabbath observance, but he is more than willing that the Protestant should make a Catholic institution a part of the civil law; it will pave the way for the establishment of the complete Catholic theocracy, which must inevitably follow the Covenanter theocracy if the blind leaders of the blind who are at the head of the National Reform and Sabbatarian movements succeed in their designs.

Mr. Gladstone's assertion that the fourth commandment enjoined "not a life, but a death," seems to have been made solely to provide a climax for his series of asseverations concerning the superior significance and authority of the Catholic Sabbath, although he has awkwardly introduced the climax about the middle of the series. It does not seem reasonable that one who accepts the Bible as the word of his god has a creditable excuse for the assumption that the establishment of the seventh-day Sabbath "enjoined not a life, but a death," whether a physical or a spiritual death it matters little. Death of what or of whom? Not of God himself, nor of the universe, presumably, for, according to the legend, God had just created that and given life to numberless forms of existence. How very little there is in the claim that Sunday is the true Sabbath for the Christian is seen by this attempt of Mr. Gladstone to discredit his god's selection of Saturday, to make light of its importance as compared with the Catholic Sabbath, Sunday.

As to what matters are proper for the "Lord's Day" Mr. Gladstone says that "all that savors most of emancipation from this earth" is eminently fit. What a compliment to the god who made "this earth"! That is the true Christian conception of this world's work and happiness. Instead of using the weekly rest-day for the purposes of healthful pleasure, or to discuss the ways and means whereby we may improve the conditions of life here and now as well as for the generations that are to come after us, we are to spend our time conning the lessons of superstition and in praying and singing about a heaven concerning which the wisest among us knows no more than the babe in arms. We deferentially suggest to the ex-Premier that "Home Rule" for all this world is just as desirable as it is for that portion of it indicated on the maps by the name of Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone is opposed to devoting a portion of the day to "worldly" pursuits; he avers that there is no authority or precedent for withholding any part of the holy day from spiritual service:

"There is no allocation of a portion, of a quantum, of time weekly for such a purpose, commanded in the Old Testament, none in the New, none in the known practice and tradition of the church."

It is not permitted to Mr. Gladstone to appeal to the Old Testament in this suit; he has repudiated the only day that it recognizes as the weekly Sabbath, and has sought to show that that day is of far less importance, in spiritual symbolry, than the Catholic Sabbath whose attorney he is. His testimony from the New Testament is only fragmentary and inconclusive, at the best, for he can find in it no command for the observance of Sunday; the most that he has are a very few texts in John that may indicate that some of the disciples sometimes met together on Sunday, but there is nothing that can help Mr. Gladstone out in his contention that all the day was spent by them in religious exercises. The testimony is purely negative in this respect. As to the "practice and tradition" of the Catholic church, whose Sabbath he is championing, Mr. Gladstone probably knows very well that that church has never been particular about the use made of the day, aside from the hours that it required its children to spend in worship. The Catholic has had much more Sunday liberty than the Protestant.

"The grace and compassion of our Lord have rescued from the open ground of worldly life a portion of that area and have made it into a vineyard seated on a very fruitful hill, and have fenced it in with this privilege, that, whereas for our six days' work the general rule of direct contact must, for the mass of men, be with secular affairs, within this happy precinct there is provided, even for that same mass of men, a chartered emancipation; and the general rule is reversed in favor of a direct contact with spiritual things."

There is some doubt as to whether Mr. Gladstone meant to say that the hill or the vineyard was fruitful, but let that pass—it is "the direct contact with spiritual things" that is peculiarly provocative of unseemly levity. So far as our observation goes, attendance at church is conducive to uncomfortable and melancholy reveries rather than to spiritual exhilaration, and the frantic zeal with which the Sabbatarians are striving to get laws to close everything but the conventicles on Sunday shows that they realize very keenly that the "mass of men" want almost anything more than they do this "direct contact with spiritual things" which church monopoly of Sunday is supposed to secure them. Even now only a fraction of the people care to attend the services of the church, believers though most of them are, and the ministers are well aware that if the privileges of the day were not under their lock and key, to a considerable extent, there would be still fewer worshipers. The people want rest and relaxation when they quit work, and certainly, for the average man, listening to an average sermon supplies neither. Mr. Gladstone tells us that "what chiefly brings the people together on the day of rest is hunger for the word of God." It is safe to say that in all the more enlightened countries and parts of countries at least one-half the attendants at Protestant places of worship are there because somebody else goes, or because their parents tell them they ought to go, or because their wives make it uncomfortable for them when they do not go, or because they have a business that needs advertising. Many of the others go because they are afraid of hell, or because they are in doubt and think it best to be on the "safe side." It is only a small minority that are actually "hungry." If the theocrats could get only the men who really like to go to church themselves to vote for Sunday laws there would be precious few of that kind of enactments. But many more think that they ought to go, or, rather, that their neighbors ought not to go to other places or to be permitted to work on the priests' day, and it is upon this reserve force that the aggressive Sabbatarians depend for influence and votes to overawe and outpoll the intelligent and consistent friends of the Free Sunday. It is this class that we must educate and arouse.

For Wise and Fleckten.

I consider the Wise case and the Fleckten case to be of the first importance to the Liberals of this country. We must sustain these men in their contest. The point they occupy must not be surrendered. We may be able to win a great victory if we stand together. I hope the Liberals will rally. We must have the funds. I myself will personally contribute $5 to the Wise fund, and $5 to the Fleckten fund. I hope many others will follow suit. The issue is forced upon us, and there must be no retreat. If each will do his best the position is ours.

The Freethought Federation will contribute what it can out of its limited funds. As it gains more it will do better. Every penny counts in a matter like this. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps will this week congratulate the New York World upon its recent able editorials demanding the repeal of the Sunday laws and present each his own strongest reason why such statutes should be swept away. This is important, and we hope that every member of the Corps will respond promptly to the call.

This is said to be "the last of the 'blue laws,'" voted out by the Connecticut Senate with but one dissenting voice:

"When any justice of the peace shall have personal knowledge that any person is guilty of drunkenness, profane swearing, cursing, or Sabbath breaking, such knowledge shall be sufficient evidence for such justice of the peace to render judgment against him without previous complaint and warrant, having first caused such person to be brought before him."

It stood for two hundred years and owes its abrogation now to the attempts of the fanatical ministers of Bridgeport and Southington to enforce it by wholesale against all forms of Sunday entertainments except their own. What form of Sunday law will take its place? The repeal kills one-man power, but will there be substituted for it equally tyrannous statutes which will depend for their enforcement upon the combination of a number of spies and despots?

A correspondent of the New York World suggests the removal of the septenary holiday to the middle of the week so as to avoid even the appearance of evil. He says that this would compel first-day worshipers to "sacrifice a day to holiness" and thus put them on an equality with the seventh-day worshipers, and also, we presume, give them a retributive taste of the medicine they have so long been administering to the Freethinkers of various schools. If our Sabbatarian friends are sincere in their claim that they are trying to secure a day of "rest" for all the people they will probably eagerly fall in with this suggestion. The correspondent adds that we should "compel secular rest, but not the keeping of holidays." Why not take a few more steps despot-way and compel night rest for all, and a prescribed number of outings, and the wearing of a specified garb in the interest of health, and the eating of only certain kinds of food? We have, collectively, the same right to do any and all of these things that we have to compel secular rest one day in seven. And we have precisely the same right to compel holy use of one day that we have to compel holiday day use of it. The most that the law can do is to give all the opportunity to rest, say one day each week, leaving to each individual the full freedom to select the day he wants, or the part of the day he wants, or parts of several days, or no day or part of a day, as he deems best. The state that grants less liberty than that is not a free state.

The Detroit Evening News, near the close of an editorial on the Sunday question as affecting proposed legislation in Michigan, says:

"It is quite possible for a narrow view of things to get a temporary upper hand, but no such view can govern permanently. It is absolutely certain no mere Presbyterian Sabbath, or Baptist, or Episcopal, or Roman Catholic, or Methodist, or Continental, or Justinian, or Carlist, or Puritan, or Infidel Sabbath, can permanently dominate the social customs of this state."

As the editor appears to be quite fair-minded and critical in his attitude toward Sunday laws we think that he will concede the pertinency of our suggestion that the Sabbath that will be best for the people of his state is the Citizens' Sabbath. By this we of course mean a Sabbath whereon the rights of one citizen are equal to the rights of any other citizen. Naturally, no special laws are needed for the Citizens' Sabbath, for on such a Sabbath no acts are criminal which are not also criminal on every other day of the week, and all acts that are criminal on the other days are likewise criminal on the Citizens' Sabbath. When this Sabbath is recognized no "narrow view of things" can dominate the legislation of the state, and the editor's wish for a Sabbath "catholic with reference to the whole people" will be realized. The only safe way to "suit the law to social and religious conditions," in a nation where church and state are separate, is to utterly ignore the religious views of any and all citizens, thus preventing the intrusion of "any particular set of class notions upon the whole state," an intrusion against which the editor of the News enters his timely protest. Surely we do not need to point out that the application of this broad rule of fundamental justice must preclude the selection for any citizen of the Sabbath he is to observe. If that is done we have class rule at once.

Did you ever know the church to protest against a popular cruelty? Where, for instance, is the church body or the church newspaper organ that has lifted its voice against the abominations of pigeon shooting for "sport"? They all get red in the face about bull-fighting in Spain and Mexico, but they are not in Spain or Mexico. The church that dominates in those countries is just as silent there about the cruelties of that national sport as the church here is about the cruelties of ours. Why is bull-fighting in Spain so much worse than pigeon-shooting in America? Certainly here are millions of victims to their hundreds there, and the "sport" is far more mean and cowardly. There the participants run some risk themselves, while here they are in no danger whatever. Why is it that we have so many pious societies for the prevention of "Sabbath desecration," while there is not one to prevent the murder of helpless innocents? The day cannot be hurt; the birds can. The Covenanters and their congeners grow frantic because the dailies report divorce proceedings, but they have not a word to say against the detailed reports of pigeon massacres. Why this partiality in favor of the wrong persons? It all grows from one root—Bible worship. That book is against divorce save for one cause, while it says that God gave to man dominion over all the beasts of the field and fowls of the air, and at the same time it is the foundation of the notion that man has a "soul," while all other animals are denied that luxury. This, in the eyes of the supernaturalists, is ample warrant for wholesale torture and destruction. The body is nothing; the "soul" is everything. In its treatment of animals, as in so many other respects, Christianity is immeasurably the inferior of Buddhism and others of the Eastern religions.

The church, whether Catholic or Protestant, has always known how to secure the co-operation of the state in its persecuting work. It had but to assume and vociferously proclaim that heresy was synonymous with treason or led directly thereto, and it soon had all the "civil" assistance it required. The condition of affairs in the southern provinces of France before Dominec began there his persecuting crusade is thus adverted to by the "Catholic Directory," published by Benziger Brothers of this city:

"They were then teeming with the heresies of the numerous sects which pass under the general name of Albigenses, and the peril seemed imminent that large numbers of persons would before long, if no restraining influence appeared, throw off the bonds of religion, social order, and morality."

So Dominec applied the "restraining influence" of sword, and rack, and flame, and "social order and morality" were saved—for the time, but now they are threatened again by the ruthless hordes of the modern "Sabbath desecrators." Listen to the threatening warning of Rev. Robert Patterson, D.D., Presbyterian:

"It is the right of the state to protect by law such a fundamental support of government. This attack on the Sabbath is treason against the very foundation of government. As such, let it be resisted by every American citizen. The American Sabbath is essential to American liberty, to our republic, and to God's religion."

How like the Catholic hunting-song of the Dark Ages that sounds! The only difference between Dominec and Torquemada on the one hand and Foster and Patterson on the other is that the two clans do not exactly agree as to what particular heresies are inimical to the safety of the state. If they did you would never receive another number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And they are gradually and not so very slowly approaching agreement.

Another of those periodical and ridiculous "judgment-of-heaven" stories is circulating through the newspapers. It was sent out by the press association agents from Buena Vista, Ga. The World of this city asks in a scare-head, "Was It the Wrath of Heaven?" the "it" being a discharge of atmospheric electricity that demolished the corner of the house of one C. S. Crawford. According to the yarn, Mr. Crawford was "spouting Infidelity" to a crowd of men assembled in his rooms. We are denied information as to the wherefore of this "crowd" in that particular domicile, but "subsequent proceedings" might justify the guess that they were working near or passing and took shelter from a storm which they saw was coming up. Anyway, Mr. Crawford was "citing portions of the scripture which he did not believe, declaring that the truth within the Bible could be spread upon ten pages of ordinary size." It is possible that this is a slight exaggeration; perhaps the truth in the Bible would "turn over" a few lines on the eleventh page; but surely God could not expect a poor fallible mortal to come much nearer to the facts in a rough, off-hand estimate made in the heat of controversy. We are further gravely informed that "when the report and flash came one of the crowd jumped with fright. Mr. Crawford remarked, 'Now look at your old sinners, with all your professions, scared nearly to death, and I am as cool as you please.' But the wicked Infidel's ungodly coolness was short-lived. "When, half a minute later, he was told that his house had been struck he turned pale." Of course a good Christian, when told that his house had been struck by lightning, would have laughed gleefully, for Christians have no fear of the forces of nature. They are killed thereby sometimes, to be sure, but that does not make the next manifestation of unrestrained elemental power any the less welcome—they are always delighted to have themselves and their loved ones put in jeopardy of wounds and death. Even ministers keep right on preaching, although there are authentic records of churches having been struck by lightning while the ministers were "spouting" Christianity and telling their credulous congregations how many Astor libraries of truth there are within the lids of that one book, the Bible. Did said clergymen see any visitation of divine wrath in the lightning that thus rent their folds and killed many of their sheep? No, sir—"God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

On March 13th the last hearing was given by the committee of the Wisconsin House which had in charge Assemblyman Notbohm's bill for the taxation of church property. F. J. Johnson, of Milwaukee, in speaking against the bill, said that it was one particularly directed against church societies. He stated that the private and parochial schools of Milwaukee had saved the city the building of twenty-eight school houses, and an annual expense bill of from $100,000 to $150,000. He did not show that anything had been saved to the people, nor that the principle of exemption was just. City Clerk Anderson, of Milwaukee, said that the bill "is the product of the advanced condition of human thought," and that the exemption of church property from taxation is equivalent to the apportionment to the religious associations of the state of a gross amount in proportion to their wealth. Paul Carpenter, of Milwaukee, arguing for total exemption, said that the exemption of $10,000 was the worst feature of the bill, and we agree with him—there should be no exemption. He declared that the $10,000 exemption "added insult to injury. The poor people of the cities, as a general thing, attend the larger churches, and this clause therefore hits the poorer classes and leaves the rich congregations untouched." It is no doubt true that in the Roman Catholic church the masses attend in the large buildings, but the statement of Mr. Carpenter does not apply in the case of the aristocratic Protestant organizations. Neither is it correct to say that the exemption proposed would leave the "rich congregations untouched." The ones really exempted would be the poorer Protestant churches and missions. But with the assessment made on the basis of one-third or one-half the real value of property the $10,000 limit would leave the great majority of the churches of the state exempt. It is all wrong. M. B. Fletcher, of Edgerton, said that the privileges of exemption were being abused. But exemption is itself the abuse. He complained because he had to pay railroad fare to Madison while the clergy received special favors. W. D. Lewis, of Madison, reasoned that the way to prevent the union of church and state was to tax the churches. By so doing we could keep them out of politics. That measure of justice will help keep them out, but complete secularization is the imperative need of the hour. O. N. Patterson, of Watertown, representing the Baptists, spoke in favor of the measure. He said that there was a growing sentiment in that church in favor of the complete separation of church and state. A. J. Emerton, of Portage, believed "the committee should look upon the bill on the broad ground of citizenship. The state of Wisconsin was able to educate every one of her own children, and did not ask for help from any private or parochial schools." Judging from the number and arguments of the advocates of equality of taxation we have no reason to be ashamed of the showing made by the friends of justice.

We have received for the Fleckten Bible-in-the-schools fight in Minnesota $5 from S. P. Putnam and $2.50 from W. J. Ribley.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer for one month: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

The Origin of Jehovah.

I submit the following ideas, First, because I believe them to be sound; and, Second, because I feel it to be a duty to truth. In dealing with this important subject—Jehovah, more commonly termed God—we will endeavor to use honesty, candor, and reason. Of all words in the universal vocabulary, "god" is the most various in its meanings. Not only is it made to express the unique conceptions of each individual, but also to answer to all the kaleidoscopic changes to which each mind is subject. It is not wise, and only tends to degrade the language, to continually strain and twist the original meaning of a word to make it fit some notion we may have, either somewhat or in no wise akin to its primitive significance. Words, especially the important ones, should convey the same meaning to all.

Ask one of the many millions of Buddhists if he has a god, and you will learn that he has a large variety, about whom he knows rather more than he knows about himself. Ask one of the fewer millions of Christians, and he will reply, Oh, yes; he has three, and could not live without them for a single moment. And the Moslem? Yes, though "God is one God, the eternal God; he begetteth not, neither is he begotten; and there is not anyone like unto him." Even the stupid Eskimo of frigid Greenland, the naked savages of Africa and Polynesia, the aborigines of America whose trails run from Patagonia to Alaska, all know God; and, strange to say, so perfect is their knowledge of the deity that, like our learned theologians, they never need ask for information about him, but are always ready to impart it.

But whence the original conception of this being? Far through the aisles of time, in the background of the legendary past, we behold the untutored savage erecting for mankind an object of worship. When the thunderbolt rent the heavens and shattered the cloud-piercing forest tree or laid his companions and kindred dead at his feet, a mysterious and awful power was made manifest to the senses of the child of nature. His superstition was appealed to in such positive language as to inspire him with intense fear and awe, and under such influence did he become invested with the idea of an overruling terror which he called god, the prototype of Jehovah. No man had caused this terrible destruction; no beast had delivered the deadly blow; and so, with no conception of the processes of nature, unguided because unlearned, prompted by his fears, and with the works of this invisible destroyer above and around, within and without, a god is born to the mind of the savage and projected thence to the field of human wonder. This bundle of ignorance and timidity, selfishness and brutality, is dealing with a mysterious, invisible, and invulnerable foe—an adversary impregnable to any implement of war, to club, or spear, or dart. Strength and strategy are powerless against him; and, as often before the strong and fierce blows of a mortal enemy, the hapless savage prostrates himself before the stronger and fiercer blows of this almighty antagonist; not as before a natural phenomenon of common occurrence, but before a god created in the image of his maker, man. So it is done, and man has a god.

Nor were birthplace, time, and conditions without their influence. During that period of the earth's development contemporaneous with primitive man, phenomena terrible and on a stupendous scale were of frequent recurrence. There were earthquakes, volcanoes, upheavals and depressions both of land and water areas, instantaneous and therefore destructive; mountains rose into being in a single night, and islands sank in a day before the astounded gaze of our first parents, themselves but a slight remove, intellectually or morally, from the wolfish cur that cowered in terror between their own trembling legs—a beast whose relation to them was that of an inseparable companion, sharing the same cave bed and perchance gnawing the same bone.

Of all the ties by which selfishness is attached to some object of possession, those binding man to his deific idols are the tightest drawn. With all the love he may bear his parents, there are times when he feels that they are not perfect in all respects. Having possibly a still tenderer affection for his offspring, he may be induced to observe in them a fault (provided it is mountain high); and even with the fondest devotion to his wife, he is sometimes forced to recognize in her something inconsistent with his notion of ideal womanhood. But when you dare to question the absolute perfection of his god, you have asked for an acknowledgment which he will never make; you are butting against a fortress that cannot be shaken. This god, this Jehovah, is perfect in every attribute; and why? Because he is the product of man's own imagination and is invested with all imaginable virtues. Every man has projected into his fancied heaven just such a god as he desires; and he is satisfied, for he has made god and pronounced him good.

It matters little what kind of a Jehovah you construct for yourself, but it is necessary that you have one of some sort, several being preferable to none. Neither is your own character essential, though the lower your general average as a man the more commendable your compliance with the almost universal dictum. Your moral standing is not a vital question, but your belief in one or more of the gods of the nomad, the savage, and the barbarian is imperatively necessary. And what of the godless? Simply this: That no matter how wise and lofty may be his conception of the universe, no matter how just and unselfish may be his conduct, perpetual banishment from the household of the master is his lot. He may admire all that is admirable in nature; he may love all mankind; he may dote upon parents, wife, and babes; philanthropy may gush from his heart like fountains from an oasis; but unless he sets up a mind-image of a Jehovah for his shield, the legions of self-appointed executioners of the souls of the godless, though their own sins may be as scarlet, will scourge him at every step with the lash of malice and contempt.

The gods of the early races, the pictured beings representing reflexively the soul—exalted, degraded, or normal—from which they were projected to the canvas of the skies, exactly suited the conditions that developed them. They have changed as the conditions changed, and have come down to us of to-day the ideal of the man of to-day; and unless a new light, and that the light of truth, shall overspread the brow of coming man, ten thousand years hence he, with all his then modifications, progressive or reversive, will still have a god representing those changes. And he will swear that God is unchangeable, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

Freethought Progress.

A new Freethought journal has appeared in the republic of Argentina. Its name is Giordano Bruno.

In the Austrian Reichstag the Socialist member, Father Scheicher (a priest), created a sensation by demanding total separation of church and state.

The Spanish Freethought paper La Tramontana, Barcelona, edited by D. José Llunas, has reappeared. It was suppressed by the Spanish government last year.

In the issue of our Italian contemporary, Christoforo Colombo, for February 8th, a writer, above the nom de plume of "Io Colombo," in highly flattering language, calls the attention of his countrymen to our anti-Sunday law petition. He advises his countrymen to sign the petition, and explains fully its use and purpose. We extend our thanks.

A song-book for children of Freethinking parents has been published in Belgium. The net profits from its sale are donated by the author, Mr. Ad. Borsus, to the Freethought Orphan Asylum. The Belgian society, Freethought, of Brussels, has, during the past year, held twelve general meetings, and the administrative committee met nineteen times. This number does not include socials, picnics, and celebrations.

The International Freethought Congress for the year 1895 will be at Brussels, Belgium, September 23d. It is proposed on this occasion to devise means whereby Freethought can make itself felt politically, and to this end prominent Freethinking politicians from Belgium, France, England, Spain, Portugal, and Italy have promised to be present and add their political experience to the furtherance of the object above mentioned.

The Norwegian author and Freethinker, Kristofer Janson, has published four new Freethought lectures which are said to be among the best extant. Freethought literature is certainly needed in both Norway and Denmark, and we hope that Mr. Janson's latest book will have a sale equal to his other works—but not as a certain one which was bought up, plates and all, by the pious Danish government, so that it should not destroy the innocence of the Danish people.

In Professor Buddé's edition of "The Books of Samuel," the verses of which are printed in different colors to represent the different strata of authorship, no fewer than nine different colors are used. What! nine gods? The annual Congress of French Freethinkers will be held at Paris, April 14th. A preparatory union to decide upon questions to be debated at the congress was held February 17th. The French Freethinkers have formed a committee to raise a monument to Maria Deraismes, an eloquent advocate of Freethought and of woman's emancipation. Maria Deraismes was the first female Freemason, having been invited to become a member by the Masonic Lodge of Le Pecq, near Paris.

Notwithstanding the patronage of religion by the emperor of Germany, the number of theological students in the chief universities has been steadily lessening during the last ten years, while the classes in medicine and jurisprudence have correspondingly increased. Dr. J. Gilchrist has translated into English Professor Haeckel's "Movism as Connecting Religion and Science: The Confession of a Man of Science." The translation is said by competent critics to be "accurate and graceful." Dr. Carus says of the volume: "The contents of the book are very rich, giving in broad and vigorous outlines a concise sketch of the state of modern science as bearing upon the ultimate problems of philosophy and religion, but more especially of the knowledge reached in the more elusive subject of biology, in which Professor Haeckel is such a distinguished worker." The work met with a marvelous success in Germany, where five editions were exhausted in five months.

J. A. Maagaard, writing in the London Freethinker, declares that the Danish countrymen are at once the most enlightened and the most skeptical peasantry in the world. For more than a hundred and fifty years the progressive movement has been insidiously at work on the foundations of orthodoxy. The course of development has been educational rather than propagandistic. "Skepticism is doing its work within the church, bigotry is dying, the spirit of Freethought is gradually gaining headway." "From the rigid and absurd form of Protestantism prevailing in England, the advance has been 'through a broader and more liberal form called Grundtvigianism, Deism, and is slowly culminating in rank skepticism on the part of the young, and many of the leading Christian teachers of the young themselves.' After 1848, when the repressive press laws were abolished and those in prison for offenses against them were liberated by the new king, Frederick VII., 'a wave of enthusiasm swept over the country. The press reveled in its new-born freedom, poets arose on every hand, and wells of literature sprang up and flooded the land.' The belief in hell is being repudiated even by ministers, and the teachings of Darwin are bearing fruit.

The Times, of Woodland, Wash., is not afraid to speak out editorially for Freethought. In a discussion with a Christian correspondent, it remarks: "To teach that Christians are more moral, honest, better citizens, kinder parents, and more patriotic, is religious slander, without statistics, facts, or figures to prove it. Good and bad people can be found among all classes." Rev. Charles E. Locke having made a severe attack on the character of Paine, the Oregonian of Portland opens its columns to able defenses of the great reformer by W. E. Copeland, S. O. H. Koch, and others. In Collinsville, Ill., died recently the wife of Mr. C. A. Singletory. The deceased had always been an outspoken Freethinker, yet her children saw to it that she received a "Christian" funeral. The minister spoke "feelingly" of the deceased's deep religious convictions, praised her piety, and depicted the joy she was to enter in the "beyond." When he was done, Mr. Singletory stepped forward and stated that "for seven years my wife has been bed-ridden; five times have I seen her on the edge of the grave, but never did she fear death. She did not believe in an 'eternal paradise,' she did not believe in a God, she was a true adherent of the teachings of Thomas Paine," etc. The "holy" people and the preacher waxed wroth and damned the whole family, Mr. Singletory especially. Behold a courageous Freethinker!

Rev. Gardner Preston, of Hastings, lecturing on the Bible, says that he prefers to regard it "as man's thoughts about God, rather than God's thoughts about man." That is quite a long step away from the altar of superstition where the average Christian worships the paper-and-ink fetish. Of London's twenty-nine public libraries, sixteen are open on Sundays. The light is breaking. Recently the National Sunday League gave a free concert on Sunday to 1,200 inmates of the City Road Workhouse of the Holborn Union. It is apprehended that the Lord's Day Observance Society may attempt to prevent the repetition of this good work, but it is not probable that it will be successful. At Cambridge, a half century ago, but five of the twenty-four professors were laymen. Now, except in the divinity professorships, of forty professors at Cambridge and forty-eight at Oxford, but three in each instance are ministers. In 1843 ninety Fellows of the Royal Society were clergymen; now but sixteen are. The church is losing its official grip on education. Winwood Reade, the author of "The Martyrdom of Man," left a cousin, Miss Amve Reade, who has lately appeared on the Freethought platform, and is the author of two humanitarian novels, "Ruby" and "Slaves of the Sawdust," both dealing with circus life. In Vol. xli of the "National Dictionary of Biography," the Freethinkers who receive notice are William Nicholson, chemist, inventor, and man of science, and the radicals, Fearns O'Connor and George Odger. Among the significant articles which have lately appeared in English periodicals should be mentioned these: Dr. Thomas Whitelaw, of Kilmarnock, contributes to the United Presbyterian Magazine two papers on "A Forgotten Higher Critic of Last Century." He gives extracts from the works of this author, and shows that his conclusions were similar to those of the critics of the present day who regard themselves as Christians. At the close of the second paper it is revealed to the good Presbyterians that this Higher Critic was no other than Thomas Paine, and the extracts were from the "Age of Reason." Would Paine have been a Christian if he had lived until this time, or are the "Higher Critics" of our day infidels masquerading as Christians? In the London Literary World of January 25th, there are several pages devoted to reviews of such works as the "Life of Bradlaugh," Haeckel's "Monism," Wheeler's "Voltaire," and other books by heretics of various schools. The waters of Freethought are rising in every channel of literature. A prominent Manchester Freethinker, Mr. E. G. Taylor, has a long article on "Intellectual Liberty and the Blasphemy Laws" in the Westminster Review for February. Of course it is able, timely, and conclusiv. In the third volume of "English Prose Selections," the editor, Henry Craik, in giving a selection from the old Anglo-Dutch Freethinker, Bernard Mandeville, says he "deserves a place in the division of English prose-history which includes Latimer and Bunyan, Defoe and Cobbett." Among the Freethought, Radical, and scientific books lately issued or announced for early publication in England are an edition of the prose writings of James Thomson, to be edited by the author's devoted friend, Bertram Dobell; a volume of memorials of Freethinkers who have been forgotten by all save the "studious conservers of the names and lives of pioneers," but who did good work in their day. The compiler is J. M. Wheeler. W. Stewart & Co. issue "The Agnostic's Primer," "a little pocket manual, intended to be to the children and youth of Freethinkers what the Prayer-Book and Bible are to the Christian school-child." Mr.

Marmery puts forth a new work, "Progress of Science," for which Samuel Laing writes an introduction; Grant Allen sends out his "The Woman Who Did," a sociological novel; Leslie Stephen writes a biography of his Free-thinking brother, Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, and issues his own "Ethical Discourses," and W. J. Linton's "Three Score and Ten Years" gives very interesting reminiscences of Mazzini, George Sand, O'Connor, the Howitts, and many more of the workers who were his contemporaries. Mr. Linton won fame as poet, author, and engraver, and was the editor of the National, the English Republic, and other advanced publications. . . . It should be said here that we are indebted to our contemporaries, the Literary Guide, Freethinker, and Agnostic Journal for most of the English news given in this department.

Lecture Notes.

After lecturing before the Manhattan Liberal Club, the Newark Liberal League, and the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, I again find myself in Boston. We expected to have a debate with the Rev. Miles Grant, but as the reverend was unable to debate on Sundays, Mr. Mendum wrote me to come back and give two more lectures. Last Sunday afternoon Paine Hall was filled, and I spoke on "Jesus Christ: His Errors and Imperfections." The idea that Jesus is a perfect man, and suitable for the guidance of the nineteenth century, I regard as not only untrue, but as a hurtful superstition. We even find some Liberals who will do homage to this chimera. Therefore, I handled the teachings of the "man of Nazareth" without gloves. At the close there was a discussion, in interest and spirit about the best in which I have participated. The opposite side was well represented. Among the Christian defenders was the Rev. Mr. Hoxie, a minister of the Adventist church. If his discourse was not logical, he is at least a gentleman, which can be said of but few ministers when in argument with an infidel.

In reply to what I had said of Christ's injunction to his disciples in Mark iv, 11, 12, he told the audience that the savior was then talking to his disciples only, and had no reference to anyone else. I answered that if such was the fact, they must have been like the men of God at the present day, who have one language to talk among themselves and another when they talk to the people. Phillips Brooks once said that the laity would be astounded could they only know what ministers say when in private conversation with each other. They would certainly lose confidence in their "spiritual guides."

Freethought is booming in Boston just now. My audiences have increased since my first visit, and the majority of the meetings of the present season have been well attended. The Investigator still bravely floats its flag to the breeze. Colonel Ingersoll has lately been here and given his great lecture on Voltaire. The religionists too have had their innings. General Booth has come and gone; St. Patrick's day was celebrated by the sons of Erin last Sunday. The Rev. Scott F. Hirshey gave a lecture in his church on "St. Patrick: The Protestant Irishman." I have always said that clergymen can never tell the whole truth, and this sermon proved it. That St. Patrick was not a Roman Catholic in the sense that those words are used to-day, no one will deny, and for a very good reason—he was born in the latter half of the fourth century. Many of the dogmas and ceremonies of that church have come into existence since that time. This the reverend gentleman did not tell. That Patrick was in substantial accord with the Christianity of his time, no one can successfully dispute. It was many years before the Christian churches were united under one head. Mr. Hirshey ridiculed the Herculean wonders that Romanists claim St. Patrick performed, yet he believes the equally ridiculous stories of the Bible, and eulogized St. Augustine, one of the greatest of ecclesiastical frauds. He scored the Catholic hierarchy for perverting history, while everything he said applies to Protestants with equal force. FRANKLIN STEINER.

White-Caps and Sabbatarians.

Here in New York we have a right to be shocked and we are shocked when we read the dispatches telling how a number of Indiana people have just taken a neighbor out and whipped him on his bare back to improve his morals. But we should be rash in concluding that this kind of public spirit manifests itself only in Indiana. It was only the other day that a poor pedler was locked up here in New York for selling ear-muffs and stockings in a way that some of his neighbors thought irreligious. Scores of otherwise innocent citizens have been dragged recently to the lock-up for pushing a ball across a table with a stick, and if we are not actually white-capping anyone illegally a strong effort has recently been made to establish the White Cap whipping-post as a permanent New York institution. All this is the result of the zeal of well-meaning enthusiasts who think they can regenerate the world by regulating the private lives and habits of other people. The Indiana White Caps undoubtedly mean as well as any other coercive regulators whatever. They are more clumsy in their methods, but that makes no essential difference. Why is it so hard for some people to understand that they are living in free America near to the twentieth century, not in Spain under the Inquisition nor in New England under the Puritans?

There are not less than half a dozen proposals pending at Albany for the reformation of our Sunday blue laws. Every one of them, without an exception, errs radically. They all recognize the right and duty of the state to prescribe and enforce the observance of Sabbaths, or, as our statutes put it, "holy time." Right there lies the fundamental wrong involved in all our Sunday laws. A purely secular state has no business and no right to prescribe any form of religious observance. It has properly nothing to do with religion except to protect every citizen equally in his right to worship God or any gods he pleases in any way and at any time that may suit him, so long as he violates no law and does not interfere with the equal liberty of his fellow citizens. The most radical of the impending bills is that of Mr. Adler. It provides that in cities of 500,000 inhabitants or more any man may carry on his ordinary business on Sunday if he files with the police authorities an affidavit pledging him to keep some other day as a Sabbath. This would be just as much a blue law as any act ever passed anywhere concerning Sunday. It rests absolutely upon the assumption that the state has a right to require the citizen to observe a Sabbath. If it has any such right it has a right also to select the particular day to be observed—New York World.

Observations.

A belated Catholic paper brings information about a miracle cure, as follows: A boy of eight years, who was squint-eyed naturally and had had his sight totally destroyed by a stone that hit his glasses, was led to a "shrine" where a section of St. Anne's spinal column was on exhibition, and recovered the power to see when the sacred relic was rubbed across the bridge of his nose. All of which occurred in the state, city, and county of New York. It is a fair sort of miracle, and the Protestant journals that have taken up the incident and proved it to be a fake can hardly have proper respect for the cherished beliefs, tender feelings, and sacred associations (if I get the cant phrases right) of their Catholic brethren. But Protestants are inclined to be weak on the question of present-day miracles, anyway, though they still profess to be awed by the old ones. Their attitude was pretty clearly indicated by the Rev. Junius Hatch when undergoing examination to test the soundness of his orthodoxy. One of the solemn committeemen pinned him down thus: "Brother Hatch, do you accept as true the account of the creation as found in the first chapter of Genesis, and do you believe that God made the world in six days of twenty-four hours each?" And Mr. Hatch said, "Yes, for anything I know to the contrary, God made the world in six days; but," he added, "I hold that the age of miracles is past, and don't think he could do it again." Protestants believe that once on a time God healed the sick, but they doubt that the trick can be repeated.

The Rev. Dr. Funk, editor of the New York Voice, is my next-door neighbor when he is at his office, but it is not on this account that there is a breach between us. The fact is that we differ on the subjects of religion and politics—that is, he believes in both, while I do not believe in either. I have no doubt that personally the doctor is a benevolent man—notwithstanding the card on his door which refers to the department of charities all applicants for relief—and if I could distinguish him from the forty or fifty other clerical seeds who rondo-voo at No. 30 Lafayette place, I should frequently invite him, when in jovial mood, to come around to the hydrant and have a drink of water at my expense. But the editor of the Voice is deaf and blind on prohibition, though providence, by some oversight, has not permitted that he should also be dumb. He professes belief in the accuracy of the Bible, which belief does not keep him from correcting it when it shows unsoundness on the temperance goose. All honest persons have to admit that certain passages of scripture condemn the drinking of wine, but its utterances are so far from being what Mr. Gladstone would call "literally homogeneous" that for every word prohibiting that beverage there are ten licensing its use. In defiance of inspired truth the editor of the Voice, who cannot, I think, make any pretensions to candor, holds and teaches dogmatically that the forbidden wine is alcoholic, while the permissible budge is the unfermented juice of the grape. The Voice and Funk & Wagnalls's publishing house are the organ and supply station for the prohibition army. The house furnishes patent insides for local prohibition papers, and the Voice does the same for the skulls of the editors who have no thinking facilities of their own. It is only the Funk school of Bible temperance prohibitionists who entertain the two-wine theory. Christians who do not happen to belong to the Prohibition party reject it as nonsense. Hebrew scholars are opposed to Funk, but such is his confidence in his own guesses that he declares that any preacher who acknowledges the presence of alcohol in the wine set forth by Jesus at the Cana wedding repudiates his master unless he at the same time advocates intemperate drinking, since the wine was set before guests who were already drunk. This utterance of the leader of the Bible-prohibition crusade should be preserved as a curiosity by the reader, who may search till his eyesight fails him without finding a better sample of bigotry. It means that every consistent Christian must imitate each individual act of Christ or be damned. He must stroll through the country subsisting on alms; in the agricultural districts swiping corn when he is hungry, and in the villages appropriating other people's horses when he wants to ride. And finally, I suppose, he must get himself hanged and trust to luck to rise the third day. Jesus Christ, if there was such a character, lived nearly two thousand years since in a foreign country, and his personal example, except as it illustrates the customs of his day, is of no more value than his old clothes. He ate and drank like ordinary citizens, and although he was called a wine-bibber there is no evidence that he consumed inordinate quantities. Persons in his financial circumstances are often temperate from necessity. But, admitting that he was a man who could drink or let it alone, he certainly established the only commemorative exercises that I know of where drinking is the main feature instead of being merely incidental to the solemnities of the occasion. I have a notion that when people were ignorant of the action of alcohol on the system they attributed its hilarious effects to the presence of a spirit in the wine, and that it was this spirit which Christ performed incantations over before his disciples placed themselves outside of it. Unfermented wine would not have the spirit in it, and the incantations would be superfluous.

But the editor of the Voice has still another fad, and this one, in addition to its foolishness, has also the character of an atrocity. It is what he designates as the "asexualizing" of men who violate the marriage vow, and he suggests a law to that end. The first thought to strike the reader is that such a law, from a clerical source, would act mainly after the pattern of a boomerang, and that the less the reverend doctor has to say on the subject the less attention he will call to that possibility. I mention this second and unseemly vagary in order to show Dr. Funk that he has chosen for the objects of his wrath two practices that lie everlastingly cemented together at the foundation of the Christian scheme of redemption. It may startle him at first to find that this is so, but he must learn to accept the truth wherever found, on Christian or on heathen ground. He will admit at once that Christ was necessary to the scheme, that he came of a line reaching back to the patriarchs, and that any change in the line must have derailed or side-tracked the salvation train with the redeemer on board. The first chapter in the New Testament begins with these words:

The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham.

Saying nothing about father Abraham—who was a polygamist—who were the progenitors of David? Well, one of them was Moab. And who was Moab? The scriptures say he was the son of Lot and Lot's elder daughter, and the same chaste record is authority for the explanation that Lot was designedly made drunk in order that he might become the father, and incidentally the grandfather, of Moab. For further particulars see later editions—the story is too rank to tell in a printing office so near to Dr. Funk's vestal amanuensis—but what has been hinted at brings out the point that drunkenness provided David with an ancestor, not to say incestor likewise. So much for intoxication as an instrument under God for the working out of his great plans. The other factor in the scheme is adultery, which the prohibitionist proposes to punish with the surgeon's knife—as if there were danger of more Solomons being born. Now Solomon was the next after David, and he was David's son by the wife of another man then living—as plain a case of adultery as was ever proved in a divorce court. This was not David's first offense, and if there had been Dr. Funk's enough in Judea, he would have been "as x ualized" before he ever heard of Bathsheba. As a consequence, no Solomon; no Solomon with his million wives or less, no genealogy and no Jesus; for I don't suppose that the reverend doctor can look his office cat in the face and say that he believes Christ's earthly father was other than a man.

Such were some of Christ's ancestors, and such the conditions under which they became so. Upon their lives and their records for chastity and sobriety the cause of Christian morality and Bible temperance rests. The humbug of the thing is that there are people, thoughtless or unscrupulous, who profess to believe that the events recorded in the Bible, including the acts of the characters named, were divinely ordered; and these same people have set up a system of conduct exactly the opposite of that illustrated by the Bible models, and now point us back to those models as their authority. Such hypocrisy and fraud raises the gorge of a reasoning animal. Concerning Funk's Specific for Unchastity, Jesus recommended it, not as a punishment but as a precautionary measure. Possibly he took his own medicine (Mat. xix, 12); the church father Origen, a few years later, thought so and emulated him. It is appropriate to point out to the prohibitionist that this application of the remedy is much more efficacious than his, since prevention averts the damage that may be done before cure can be effected. Moreover it is in perfect harmony with prohibition principles, for no sincere Prohibitionist will go into a mixed company with the intoxicating bottle in his possession.

It is to be questioned whether the police of New York, by suppressing an exhibition of bronzed nudity on the stage, have not delayed the solution of a great social problem. For the past year or more we have had living pictures in tights, attractively, we are assured, because they were demoralizing. That craze having exhausted itself, the manager of a Broadway theater introduced living statuary, substituting drapery and bronze paint for tights. This drew well at first, but shortly succumbed to the satiated appetite and popular indifference that had done the business for its predecessor. Then, as the audiences decreased, the drapery was gradually discarded, until the statue was left unclad except for insignificant elastic tights and bronze powder stuck on with vaseline. The drift was evidently toward unclad and unpainted nudity when the police intervened and placed manager and models under arrest. Of course the only question is whether it would not have been better, as a very disagreeable alternative, to let this eroticism reach the verge and finally go down the bank into oblivion, a played-out fad. Now, as only the supply is cut off, leaving the demand unsatisfied, there is danger of a recurrence of the injurious exhibition; then, "when the worst that can be has been done," and the hollowness thereof demonstrated, a revival of it would be unprofitable and therefore not liable to occur.

During the trial of a case before Chief Judge Sedgwick in the supreme court, this city, last week, an eleven-year-old girl was offered as a witness. She was so small that the judge thought it proper to find out if she understood the nature of an oath, and the following examination was had to that end:

Q. Do you understand the nature of an oath? A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is it? A. It is a swear.
Q. What do you mean when you say it is a swear? A. Well, it is that I have to tell the truth.
Q. If you don't tell the truth, what then? A. That would be a sin.
Q. What is a sin? A. A bad mark from God.

The report says that "the venerable chief judge was visibly touched" and that he complimented the child on her intelligence, which is probably true. All the men on the bench are not free from superstition, and some of them are not sufficiently familiar with religious methods to discriminate between nativ ignorance and the sophisticated twaddle of the Sunday-school. They all ought to know, though, how easily and how often witnesses are drilled beforehand by the attorneys for dramatic effect, and should be able in such cases to keep their emotions under control. The testimony of this mistaught little parrot was admitted, but the jury extinguished the pious moral of the incident by disregarding her story and, without leaving their seats, finding a verdict for the other side.

An inquirer who has noted my weakness for indulging myself in remarks on the use of language and boring my readers therewith, desires to know how the word "evolute" stands with the philologists. I hope not to get many inquiries of this kind, as my knowledge of philology is short and I read more profitably than I write on that subject; but evolute is an easy victim and is hereby condemned. "Evolution" belongs to the same family as "involution" and "revolution" when the last has the meaning expressed in "the American revolution." A government is not revolved. A man cannot involute himself in trouble, nor evolute himself or be evolved out of it. The government is revolutionized, the individual (altogether too frequently) is involved in difficulty, and if we must have a verb from "evolution" it is evolutionize or evolve. But why cannot the Freethinker who has "evolved" out of Christianity say that he grew? Evolution sometimes works the wrong way.

"According to Luke, Jesus, having been born in Bethlehem, was taken, after forty days, to Jerusalem, and there publicly presented in the temple; after which his parents returned with him to Nazareth. On the other hand, according to Matthew, after the birth of Jesus in Bethlehem, his parents were warned to flee with him into Egypt, since Herod, at Jerusalem, would be lying in wait for the child to destroy him. This warning was obeyed; hence, according to Luke, Jesus was publicly presented in Jerusalem at the very time when, according to Matthew, he was carried to Egypt to avoid being seen in Jerusalem."—Judge C. B. Waite, in the Investigator.

The Judge, perhaps from weariness, has not disclosed all the strange things that crowded themselves into the little space covered by his remarks. Not only was the youngster in two or three places at once, but he was there for as many different reasons. Of course he went to Egypt to escape the slaughter of innocents, and he had to be in Jerusalem for presentation at the altar (circumcision?), but the Egyptian excursion was for still another purpose, namely, that of fulfilling prophecy—"Out of Egypt have I called my son"—though no such prophecy had ever been made about him; neither does it fit the case, as Jesus was not called out of Egypt but out of Galilee into Egypt. Incidentally he must be conveyed to Nazareth to verify another prophecy—"He shall be called a Nazarene"—though the prophets never spoke these words of anybody. Matthew, who makes this queer break, appears not to have been aware that Nazareth was the habitat of Joseph; that an angel had visited Mary there, and that when Joseph, with his female and young, "turned aside into Galilee" and "came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth," he was merely going home. Matthew and Luke should have "got together." Some of our Irish citizens who, two weeks ago, celebrated Sunday and Monday, March 17th and 18th, to the glory of their patron saint, explain that St. Patrick had two birthdays "because he was twins." In view of the variety of localities occupied simultaneously by the subject of these remarks there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that he was triplets. I charge the Christian world nothing for this prop to the doctrine of the Trinity.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The New Genesis.

DEDICATED TO THE CHRISTIANS OF EVERY LAND.

Having an ardent desire to end the controversy between men of science and the believers in the Mosaic account of creation, and being filled with the holy ghost, I come before a thinking world—or, what is about the same thing, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER—with a new theory in regard to creation which I am fully persuaded will be accepted by all scientific persons, and which will prove entirely satisfactory to every believing Christian.

"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. He made the stars also."

But what did he make the stars out of? Just nothing—that is all the material there was. But I propose to show that it was all that was needed in the hands of an all-powerful God. Some may think this was a pretty thin material out of which to make worlds and suns and systems, but it must be remembered that, if the material was very thin, there was an unlimited quantity of it—which I shall proceed to show.

Suppose we could shoot a cannon-ball from the earth to the sun in a second, and then suppose another cannon-ball should be shot from the sun in a right line with that from the earth to the next nearest fixed star, and suppose these cannon-balls should be shot from star to star for a thousand years, and that these balls should pass from one star to another in a second of time, we should be no nearer to the last star than when the first ball was fired from the earth. Before these worlds and suns and systems were created all of this space was filled with just nothing, plus God, and he was a spirit. So that it will be seen what a vast stock of nothing he had on hand as raw material. Then it must be borne in mind that this spirit was clothed with almighty power. Of course there must be a vast amount of solid matter in these innumerable worlds, and the question arises, How could all of these suns and planets be made out of nothing by a spirit?

Such a question avails nothing except to expose the ignorance of the questioner, and shows that the subject has not received due consideration. The philosophic mind will see at once that these systems of suns and planets bear no just proportion to the unbounded field of nothing. So vast was this field that if it had been reduced to thousand-mile cubes, their number would have been too great to be enumerated. So it will be seen that if the number of worlds was very great, the stock on hand was ample.

But how could a spirit reduce nothing to planets and suns? O ye of little faith, follow me; the solution is very simple: In the first place God collected together a vast amount of pig's rennet, and this he scattered through unlimited space with his all-powerful hand. As soon as the rennet took effect the great expanse of nothing began to curdle and it grew more dense, "and God saw that it was good;" and he said, "Gee whiz! pig's rennet is a success. And the evening and the morning were the first day."

And God saw that the endless nothing was not yet of sufficient consistency to work up into worlds, and he said, Let us scoop out a mighty gorge, deeper and greater than that of Niagara—yea, let it be deeper and wider than the bottomless pit. "And it was so."

Having completed the wonderful gorge, he sat down to get a little dirt out of his eye, and soliloquized thusly, "Well, that's a h—l of a hole; it must be conceded that I am the boss ditcher. I'm tired, my hands are blistered, and I sweat like a beaver." And feeling quite thirsty he reached for the pitcher. A "snifter" went into the maw of the ditcher, and God began to roll the curdled nothing into the mighty pit which he had digged, and the impact increased the density mightily. And God jumped on it with both feet and stamped upon it and trampled it down. "And God saw that it was good" and increasing in density. And the evening and the morning were the second day. And God mixed up a batch of the pressed nothing, but he could not make it hard enough, and he was wroth, and his countenance fell, and he said, "I will not be euchred or turned from my purpose." And God said, "Let us make a great machine, like unto a hay press; but, Great Scott! let it be as much greater as boundless space is greater than a tin rattle-box." And it was so. So God created this machine, and he saw that it was good. "And the evening and the morning were the third day."

And God tried the machine, and it proved to be a "dandy," and he said, "Great is the Lord and greatly to be magnified. Ah, ha! there is none like me, neither above nor beneath," for the press instead of pressing a substance into squares or cubes, pressed it into globes; and God was delighted and danced and turned a summersault; for he saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

And God said, "Let us put the compressed nothing into the machine and press out worlds, and he did so. Yea, he fed it into the machine, and he came down upon it with all his power, even as the ox's foot cometh down upon a tadpole. And in feeding the machine he jammed a nail off his finger, and he cried, "Ad-e-zook-ah," which being interpreted means d—n the luck. But God is not a man to repent, neither can he be turned from his purpose, and he worked the machine, and turned out worlds abundantly, and he saw that they were good and he blessed them. And the morning and the evening were the fifth day.

And after the day's work was done, and God had taken all the compressed nothing out of the pit, Satan appeared unto him. And God said, "Whence comest thou?" And Satan said, "Up out of the pit which thou hast digged; and I will fill this pit with brimstone and here shall be my headquarters." And God stretched forth his hand and took Satan by one of his horns; and Satan said, "Let go that horn—such familiarity will breed contempt," and he drew his three-tined fork. And God said, "Dost thou behold the wart on my nose?" And Satan said, "I behold." And God said, "Now I swear by that wart that if thou dost not put thy fork aside I will stand thee on thy head." And Satan went his way, and God whistled ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay.

And God said, "Go to now; these worlds must be distributed. Let us therefore build a derrick both great and high, even as high as the imagination runneth." And God stood upon the derrick and he did cast the worlds into space from his almighty hand. And he was the first to throw a curve ball; and he curved them greatly, even so much that they went in circles. And as he was casting the worlds from the top of the derrick one which had a sharp corner of nothing sticking out from the side of it barked his hand, and in the bitterness of his anguish he cried out, "I am sick of the whole dodgasted business. Any God that has not got the foresight to see the outcome better keep out of the creation racket. It has been a busy week, and for a God who is only an 'entered apprentice,' it has been hard on me. I blistered my hands in digging the great pit, and I jammed my finger in that old hay-press—besides, it winded me a good deal to run it—and now I am knocked out entirely. Let the world-making business go to sheol. I'm going to hav a rest." And the morning and the evening were the sixth day.

And God said, "The heavens and the earth are finished and all the hosts of them, and I am mighty glad of it. If any poor God was ever put through a course of sprouts I am that God. If I had known that I would come out the sorriest God that ever undertook to get an honest living, I would have been ripped up the back before I undertook the job. I don't know whether it is finished according to contract or not, and I don't care. I am so done for that I could not even make another little world, and I throw up the sponge. Oh, this is a bully day; I can just stretch out on the grass and take it easy. I'll remember this seventh day just as long as I live, for on this day I rested when I could do no more. Another day's work would have sent me up the flue. Blessed be this day, for on it I had a lay-off when I was fagged out. Let the man who attempts to do any kind of work on this day be chased by knock-kneed skunks by day and haunted by cross-eyed owls by night. Selah."

For years ministers and Christian writers have been trying to harmonize the account of creation as set forth in the book of Genesis with the claims of science, and it has proved a signal failure. An Infidel devotes one Sunday to the subject and the thing is accomplished. Tally one for the Infidel. And I would say to the clergy of every Christian denomination: You are at perfect liberty to promulgate this new version of Genesis for the edification of your hearers and the glory of God. And as I do not intend to have this new theory copyrighted, I would say to the religious press, Publish it from Dan to Beersheba without let or hindrance. And to the great spirit who used the rennet and brought this world into existence, and who presides over the destiny of unnumbered worlds and systems, I am not only with you, but for you. With much respect and best wishes, I am sincerely and truly thine.

JOHN PECK.

A Memorial.

On Thursday, March 14th, I was called to attend the funeral services of Lorenzo D. Dutton, which took place at his home in Clinton county, Iowa. Mr. Dutton died March 13, 1895, at the age of 76 years. He was born in Chenango county, N. Y., June 28, 1818, the son of Charles and Nancy Pearsall Dutton. He was a pioneer both in Iowa and in California. He came to Iowa—then a territory—in 1841, and in 1850, with his brother Jerome, made the overland journey to California. He remained in California four years, and then returned to Iowa. In 1856 he married Miss Sarah H. Allison. He leaves nine children—Charles A., Viola M., Orsini, Nancy P., Marth J., Lorenzo D., Elva B., Orpha M., and Goldie May. His daughter Blanche I. died a few years since. At the time of Mr. Dutton's death he was vice-president of the Clinton County Old Settlers' Association and presided at the meeting of that society held at DeWitt last fall. He held the offices of justice of the peace, county assessor, etc. In every respect he occupied a high position in the community and vindicated Free-thought and the worth of humanity. He stood for liberty, reason, science, and reform always. For over fifty years he was a citizen of Iowa. He lived without fear and died at last in peaceful repose.

The four Dutton brothers have been for half a century a great influence for freedom and progress in Iowa. Leroy Dutton, the eldest of the brothers, born in 1816, died Dec. 19, 1894. He came to Iowa in 1839. He married in 1843, Miss Harriet Heller, who died in 1845. In 1848 he married Mrs. Flora Baldwin, who died in 1889. He leaves no children. A stepson survives him, Richard C. Baldwin, who married Miss Emily Brown in 1860 and has four children living. Mr. Baldwin occupies the old homestead of Leroy.

Jerome Dutton, the youngest, was born in 1826. He left New York in 1837 for Pennsylvania, and thence came by raft to Madison, Ind., thence to Alton, Ill., and in the spring following settled in Iowa. He went to California in 1850, and returned in 1854. He was elected to town and county offices; was justice of the peace, etc. In 1856 he married Miss Oelinda Parker, who survives him with two children, Claude W. and Bessie. He died Oct. 4, 1893.

Charles Dutton is the only one who now lives of the four brothers. Born in New York, 1823, with his brothers he went Westward and settled in Iowa, 1839. He married Miss Hannah Grace, 1845, and has one son living, Horace Greeley Dutton. Another brother, John, died in 1840, aged twenty years. All this family have been faithful these many years, in the front ranks, to the principles of Free-thought. They have left a noble record, and with pride we can point to their long and honorable service. They have never faltered, and their children and grandchildren have a precious inheritance of memory and love.

Around the grave the heart of humanity beats and friendship grows, and the glorious thoughts of liberty and progress make the mind elate. We meet the inevitable with courage and not despair.

I enjoyed the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Dutton. I was pleased to meet with H. G. Dutton, who is devoted to our cause and will certainly be of service upon our platform in the future. He was married Oct. 21, 1891, to Miss Clara Barr; has one son, Charles Earl, born Nov. 11, 1894. Thus, amidst the shadows of the grave, glow the beautiful hues of life's morning, and the bloom of birth irradiates the tomb.

It was a pleasure also to meet Claude W., the son of Jerome Dutton, a young man of fine literary ability—a contributor to many of the secular newspapers—who, in spite of physical weakness, maintains a splendid courage for life's battle.

Our old comrade, James A. Greenhill, was also with us to render the last tribute to our fallen friend, and to give his sympathy and the true heart of humanity which only can cheer in an hour like this.

We can give no false hopes to the stricken spirit—no light of heaven mingled with the lurid fires of an eternal hell. We can give only the common light of sun and sky—the voice of nature and of reason which teaches us to meet life and death with equal spirit, not to be crushed, but to be strong in human love and duty; to make the best of what is, and to press forward. We are not alone, but together. We work with one another, and for one another, and in each day's toil find the reward and hope, not of an unknown future, but of the living and beautiful present, which death cannot destroy, but illuminates with heroism and sacrifice. The dead are not forgotten. Their virtues are still the light of our pathway.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Prophecy, as such, seems to have been a very common method in the remote past for recording history. Those unacquainted with ancient customs, when looking back upon what purports to be prophetic revelation, are confounded at its accuracy, real names sometimes appearing, though such persons or places did not really exist until centuries after the alleged prophecy. Glance through what passes for history, labeled New Testament, and we are frank to admit, if there was such a character as Jesus, and he is correctly reported in the gospels, then there is one genuine prophet reflected on our times, and that person was Jesus. Our Christian friends, we are sure, will thank us for this admission. A prophet, if you please, reader, not a God. What are the proofs?

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword."—Matthew x, 34.

"And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child; and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death."—Matthew x, 21.

"For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law."—Matthew x, 35.

"For, from henceforth, there shall be five in one house divided, three against two, and the two against three."—Luke xii, 52.

Go, read the bloody history of Christianity from the time these terrible words are claimed to have been uttered, and what a literal fulfillment! Discord, violence, wars, and death mark every page of history from that time to this.—London Free-thinker.

The subject of the impartial and indiscriminate taxation of all church property is awakening widespread interest over the entire country. In Wisconsin and Michigan the fight is waxing hot with an even chance of the advance wing of humanity winning the battle. In the state of Washington and in New York the advocates of a religious church and a secular state—total severance of church and state—are making vigorous battle and are steadily gaining ground. Not one-fourth of the people ever enter a church, and many take it as a hardship that they and the entire mass of people should be taxed for the benefit and advantage of the few that do, and that is what the withholding of more than six hundred millions of dollars invested in church property from assessment and taxation amounts to. The vast amount of church property put on the tax books would aid the tax-burdened owners of mortgaged homes and farms materially. To say that the untaxed church edifices are a benefit to the morality of the country and claim exemption on that score is basing a false claim on false premises, for the great majority of people do not and will not attend the churches. There is a strong undercurrent of feeling on that subject in Florida that will burn its way to the surface in the not far distant future. Let justice be done though the heavens should fall.—Tampa (Fla.) Daily News.

Samuel P. Putnam, in a series of lectures on Free-thought at the Jaffa Opera House, was a grand success, far beyond the most sanguine expectations. He proved himself an able, efficient, forcible, and eloquent speaker. His expression of what Free-thought is and its methods was simply logical illumination. Crystallized in a nutshell he affirmed that Free-thought was based on truth, morality, liberty, science, and everything that improves the world and makes mankind better and happier. I believe the effect of these lectures will be beneficial. People are thinking, talking, investigating, and this is the pathway to truth. Further, I think the effect will be to liberalize and broaden the public mind and make it more tolerant and just to all systems of thought and activity. These lectures have developed the fact that Free-thought has a large following in Trinidad. I feel highly delighted over the result. Heretofore I have been almost in a gang by myself. Now I am in the midst of a genial, magnificent sympathy.—J. R. Maulding, in Trinidad (Col.) Monitor.

FRANKLIN STEINER left for the West last Wednesday. In May he will make a trip into Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Northern Michigan. Write him for engagements to Box 882, Des Moines, Iowa.

He Was an Excellent Pastor.

One afternoon, about two years ago, we were standing on the corner of Franklin and South Fourth streets, talking with a Methodist, when we were joined by a prominent Episcopalian. In the course of our conversation, which was somewhat of a jocular character, the Methodist, placing his left hand on our right arm, said to the Episcopalian: "Did you ever know that this man was once my pastor?" "Yes," said the Episcopalian, "and he was a damned good one, too."—Editor Shaw, in the Independent Pulpit.

Letters of Friends.

A Case of Miscegenation.

SPRINGDALE, ARK., March 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1 for your noble and truthful paper.

Now will you please tell me to what nationality Jesus belonged? I know his mother was a Jewess, but what was this Holy Ghost? I cannot understand.

Yours as ever, J. W. COLEMAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You are dead right on the Sunday question; what is a crime on Sunday ought to be a crime on Monday. The article in January 19th as to who is damned, is good. Yes, Jesus was "something of a reformer." That American Eagle article in same issue, beginning "It is our duty," is way off its base; it don't go. Your comment is O. K. THE TRUTH SEEKER is splendid. I buy it weekly from an old lady who keeps a store. I buy it that way because it gives two people a chance to make a living. Anything that I can do for you in this land of sunshine, fruit, and flowers, I will try to do. The world is progressing over in Berkeley at the university. Nothing like science to bring people to their senses. Hoping that you will still peg away at the Sunday business (and no Bible in public schools), I remain, Sincerely yours, A. JOHNSON.

LOCUST CORNER, O., March 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It has been said that composers are the most abused class of men in the world. Perhaps they deserve it. They have evidently been "monkeying" with a communication in your issue of March 2d, entitled, "Truth About the Tariff." They should try again, and for the words "free trade" and "free trader," they should substitute "protection" and "protectionist," and vice versa.

This will not remove all of the absurdities, but it will intersperse sparks of reason through an article that is otherwise absolutely senseless, and at the same time relieve its author of the apparent responsibility for exactly five point blank —s.

Unless these corrections be made in Mr. Hamilton's communication, that gentleman will be justified in visiting THE TRUTH SEEKER composing room with a tomahawk.

CHAS. O. HAYS.

ATCHISON, KAN., March 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I presume you will be pleased to learn that I have taken one step toward having the name of Thomas Paine brought before the children of our public school. As the pupils all had to speak pieces in honor of George Washington's birthday, and as I could find no piece suitable, I composed these lines for my boy to speak:

Be true, my friends! 'tis grand to live
With ideals high to lead you on;
'Tis grand to dedicate and give
The mind and toil like Washin' ton,
One of the bravest, grandest men
That ever walked beneath the sun.

And there's another hero sleeps
With him beneath the heaven's blue,
Whose memory every patriot keeps
Undimmed among the noble few.
Let's wave the banner too for him
And give to Thomas Paine his due;

To Thomas Paine, who hand in hand
With Washington made gallant fight;
Who saved and gave our suffering land
To freedom and eternal right.
Let not their names be e'er forgot
Nor Liberty be lost to sight.

Yours for Liberty,

MRS. GEORGIA BERGMAN.

Compulsory Praying! Think of It!

GEORGETOWN, COL., March 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Father has been a subscriber to your paper for a long time, and we feel we cannot do without it. Times are very hard here owing to the downfall of silver, thus closing the most of our mines and throwing so many men out of work.

Yet, every Sunday, we can see our five churches here crowded with these same men and their families, often taking their last cent, giving it to the minister for him to dress finely and lie around at his ease, while they go home to their dinners of—what? Perhaps, bread and water.

As in many other places, our good Christian friends introduced religion into our public schools, but the children of Mr. Joseph Gallagher refused to pray, whereupon the teacher tried to make them, but they complained to their father, and our Freethinkers joined in a band and did away with religion in the public schools here. We are about one hundred and fifty strong here, but seldom have any Freethought lectures. I think it would be a good idea if some good Freethinking speaker would come into our little mining camps and guide us in the path where we may think for ourselves.

Inclosed please find $1.50 for my father (John Cowen's) subscription, and we will send more money as soon as it is possible.

Yours truly, MAGGIE E. COWEN.

Missed the Cartoons That Week.

MINNEAPOLIS, March 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As I am one of the delinquents that you admonish weekly to settle with the publisher, and as I have been using your money, as it were, for the last four or five months, I think it no more than right to pay you interest; that will at least make me feel square with you, so I remit a year's subscription with interest, and twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL. I would like to get Putnam's great book, and many others, but I have no work at present. I have invented a machine for putting horse collars together without stitching. If I make a few thousands out of it, I will remember the great champion of mental liberty, the editor of our paper. I have a good many back-numbers, and I guess I will make another grand distribution, as this city needs enlightenment badly enough. I would like to donate to the Wise and Fleckten funds, and will if I get into business soon. If you will send me a package of back-numbers I will circulate them among the young men. I think it is not much use to give them to old people. I see no cartoons in last copy of the paper. Heston has not given us a God with a horn in his hand—see Hab. iii, 3, 4. The orthodox God and devil make a great team, one with horns in his head, and the other with horns coming out of his hand. Selah.

A true friend to the cause,

S. G. COOPER.

WORCESTER, MASS., Feb. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In the early '70's I received a small paper from Illinois with the title TRUTH SEEKER, published by D. M. Bennett, the issue to be as often as circumstances warranted, at fifty cents a year. I immediately became a subscriber by remitting for two years. I have repeated the practice ever since and witnessed the growth of the paper to sturdy manhood. I wonder how many are left on your list of subscribers that commenced with the first number? The paper has done and is doing a great work, especially the telling cartoons of Heston; they speak eloquently, and I only wish they could be seen weekly by the whole population of the United States. I sent you a few days ago a copy of one of our dailies which set forth the feeling of one orthodox church of this city toward another of the same stripe, which has purchased the land and is about to erect a church building on the opposite corner. Each of these churches has its own portion of wealthy attendants. Verily how they love one another! Perhaps this might make a subject for Heston or a topic for G. M., the observations writer.

Inclosed find check for the year's subscription, a little delayed, but no doubt it will still come handy. May success attend your efforts is the earnest wish with which I subscribe myself,

Most sincerely, HENRY S. BACON.

P.S.—Send me copy of ANNUAL.

Applying Commercial Methods.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., March 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed order with that of two weeks ago makes a total of 32 copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" that I have sold in this vicinity in the last few weeks. I previously sold four copies I had on hand, making a total of three dozen copies circulating here. This ought to do much good and lay the foundation for Freethought work in future.

Selling persons the book seems better than lending it them, as they are likely to read it enough to get their money's worth out of it. Furthermore, they then have it to lend to others if they choose, and you avoid the usual trouble incurred in getting the return of a borrowed book.

Some of my success in selling the book is probably due to my having sixteen years' experience as a salesman. I first excite their curiosity and desire to see the book (of which I seldom show them a sample) by telling them that it is over a hundred years old—a rare book—more talked about than any other theological book ever written, yet not one in a thousand has ever seen it. Next I tell them my cloth-bound copy of it cost me $1.50, but that the paper-bound copy of it which contains the most important part (omitting only the letters from Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and a few others) can be bought at the low price of forty cents. Then I offer to send in their money free if they will purchase a copy of this. I then tell them of the "Age of Reason" alone, which omits only the "Examination of the Prophecies," and can be had for the low price of twenty-five cents. But, I add further, I am getting such a lot of them that I will get them at about fifteen cents each and I will have one sent you for the same. Coming all the way down from $1.50 to forty cents, and finally to fifteen cents, with very little of real importance omitted from the book, makes it look so cheap that very few people will refuse to purchase a copy. I hope more will try it with equal success.

The "Trial" Was a Success.

AUGUSTA, ILL., March 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: My three months' trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER expired March 1, and I am well pleased with the paper. The cartoons by Heston are splendid, and each one is a nail in the coffin of Christianity. I like the aggressiveness of the paper. We have got to fight if we win the battle.

Inclosed is $4.70. Send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," ANNUAL; "Bible Temperance;" "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle;" and "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child."

I hope to get a club of four subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and get Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for myself. Will you please explain in the paper why part of the Freethinkers use the date as follows: March 3, 295? The Secular Union uses same, and I must confess I am ignorant as to why they do so.

FRANK L. CHAMBERS.

[They date from the beginning of the year 1601. This is called the Era of Man, or, by some, the Era of Science. It is intended to commemorate and perpetually indicate the acceptance of the Copernican conception of the universe as opposed to the teaching of the church that the earth was the center of the solar system and the sun and stars but attendant orbs created to serve the interests of man, for whom God had made a heaven and a hell, to the former of which would go at death those who had accepted Jesus as the redeemer and to the latter of which he would consign those who had rejected him. In the old view, the earth was flat and stationary, with heaven just above and hell just below. Giordano Bruno was burned at Rome on the 17th of Feb., 1600, for teaching doctrines at variance with the Bible and church idea. He was at once the martyr of Freethought and of science. About this time appeared Grotius's treatise on international law, which was the beginning of the end of war, we hope.—ED. T. S.]

One Who Is Not Lukewarm.

PENACOOK, N. H., March 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: By your good editorial on "Work That Should be Done at Once," we were reminded that our subscription would soon be out. I send $8—$5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Paine's "Great Works Complete," and the ANNUAL, the remainder to be used for the cause wherever you think it is most needed.

If you had as much money at your command as you have good common sense and fighting ability the church would never steal a march on us.

I marvel that you have the courage to keep hammering away when we, your readers, that is, many of us, do so little to aid you. And then the times are so hard, and little prospect of any improvement, as we seem to be completely in the power of the gold-bugs and corporations. I see no way out unless we make a raid on them as our grandmothers used to on their near relatives, the bed-bug, with an old coffee-pot and plenty of hot water. They are much worse than the bed-bugs in that they are not content with our blood, but they want the very bed and all.

Have you read "Shylocks," by Gordon Clark? I wish every thinking person might read it, especially the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We enjoyed Mrs. Semple's reply to Morse's harangue on Ingersoll's lecture; we got the same from all the pulpits in Concord and Manchester after he was out of their reach. They even sent to Boston for help to pull poor old God out of the gutter. No paper that I saw gave anything but a notice of the lecture, while the sermons were printed in full. That's justice.

The sermons reminded me of a talk I had with a pious lady: "How could I doubt there was a heaven, when God showed us so plainly there was? The trees and flowers died and came to life and beauty again." I told her I had never seen a dead tree leave out, and that when they shed their foliage in the fall they were no more dead than she was when she fell asleep at night to awaken in the morning refreshed for another day's journey here on the shores of time.

We send greeting to all the truth seekers at home and abroad, to our former workers who are resting in the twilight of life, and to the author of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," to Eugene that his pen may never falter, while George will always "observe."

Sincerely thine, ETTA MARDEN.

How the Bible God Looks and Acts.

VALLEY JUNCTION, IA., March 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We have had for some weeks a Bible pounder who has been frothing at the mouth to get at an infidel. A week ago he defined his God, and proved him from 1 Kings xviii, 17. I flooded the town with the inclosed dodger, and sent him word that I not only would meet him, but would give him $10 per night to meet me. He is very meek now, and is trying to crawl. Like Elijah, his Jezebel is after him, and he is on the run.

I have written several articles for the papers here, but I cannot tone them down to orthodox style; so they are rejected. Their side is given every day, and of course they get no reply; have it all their own way. Yet I am surprised to see the many who oppose them, since the dodger appeared.

JOHN DAVIS.

THE DODGER.

"The man who disagrees with us may do so honestly, and yet not be a coward or a fool."

"He proved his God."

Yes, Elijah proved his God by the Bible, but he did not give us a picture of this God. We will give a Bible picture of him, and also some of his attributes.

"Round about him were dark waters and thick clouds; his head and hairs were white as snow; his eyes were as a flame of fire; his feet were like unto fine brass; he had horns coming out of his head; burning coals went forth at his feet; in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the son of man. He had in his right hand seven stars, and out of his mouth went a two-edged sword. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils and fire out of his mouth." Again: "Our God is a consuming fire; dwells in darkness; his anger burns forever; is the author of good and evil." A most terrible being. But his inspired prophets do not stop here. As terrible a being as he is, they make him afraid of man, and not able to lead his people, or control his passions. He indorses polygamy, adultery, and lying, encourages theft, robbery, slavery, cheating, drunkenness, and injustice to women, intolerance, persecution, cruelty to children and animals, human sacrifices, cannibalism, poverty, vagrancy, ignorance, and obscenity, is jealous and repents, and "gives laws not good." All these are as fully proved by scripture as that there is a God, and if inspiration when applied to scripture means truth then this is all true, and Elijah's God is found. We have a God of our own, but since Elijah's God has been proven we dare not search the record of ours for fear he may also prove to be worse than the Bible devil, and we might lose all confidence in all gods. Yet he did not tell us how a short time before this a certain woman, Jezebel by name, killed the prophets of the Lord, and after Elijah had proved his God and killed four hundred and fifty of the prophets of Baal, he appeared before Jezebel. When Jezebel heard of the slaughter she sent him word that about that time to-morrow she would make him like the dead whom he had killed. Elijah fled for his life to Beersheba, left his servant there and went a day's journey into the wilderness, took two meals there and traveled forty days to get out of the way of this woman and lodged in a cave at Mount Horeb. The Lord asked him what he was doing there. He told the Lord, "The children of Israel have forsaken thee, thrown down thine altars and slain thy prophets with the sword, and I, even I, only am left, and they seek my life." He did not tell us the Lord himself at one time became the captain of the forces of Judah, and killed 500,000 Israelites, and that they also sometimes worshiped Baal, sometimes a calf, and sometimes God. Any of these gods are fully proven by scripture. Bible geography tells us the earth is flat, has corners, sides, ends, pillars, and foundations. Its astronomy is no better: the sun, moon, and stars were made after this earth was formed and set in the sky for lights to this world, and were very small affairs, as the several millions occupied God's time only one day to create all, while it took five days to create this earth. The sun, moon, and stars traveled around this earth every twenty-four hours. The sun set at noon one day; it was stopped and set back ten degrees another day, and stopped for several hours for Joshua to massacre helpless men, women, and children. All these things are fully proven also by scripture.

JOHN DAVIS.

Mortuary—John Davies.

Boston, March 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find clipping from the Boston Post announcing the death of John Davies, who was at one time a subscriber to your paper. He was ever ready to battle for the cause of Freethought, and his memory will always be pleasant in the minds of Boston's Freethinkers.

E. S. TAYLOR.

The Post heads its report of the funeral: "John Davies—Tribute to the dead Freethinker and actor by his friends."

Friends of the great Freethinker and famous Boston actor, John Davies, gathered last evening in Hospitaler Hall to pay their tributes of love and respect to the departed.

Mr. James Cooper said: "I always found Mr. Davies a perfect man. He always stood for the enthronement of reason. He was always a fearless advocate of men's right to think for themselves."

"He was born in Chester, England, in 1821. He began his trade in Manchester, England, at the age of ten years. He came to Boston at the age of seventeen. He made acting a profession, and in the meantime he worked at his trade of a barber."

"In August, 1851, he became a member of the Boston Museum company, and continued shaving and acting until 1861, with the Museum company."

"He was the oldest barber in Boston at the time of his death."

"The only fault that anyone can find with him is that he was an 'unbeliever.'"

Mr. Melvin said: "Mr. Davies's early associations showed him the true and the false in life. He was just as ardent a hater of all that shackles mankind as Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, and the other heroes of his time. No man was ever handicapped by Mr. Davies. He never applied the gag in any meeting."

"He has gone, we know not where. The most fitting tribute to his memory is to keep alive the work of Liberalism that he began."

Dr. J. Van Elderen said: "I come here to pay a humble tribute to a worthy man. Fathering a cause devoted to free speech and opposed to demagoguery and gag rule, he triumphed. He was a Freethinker and had the courage to defend his ideas. His work here has left an impress on all Boston. He was one of the grand heroes who are not born to die. He had a power, a will, to the very last. He was a hero and died as he lived."

Mr. Greenwood said: "He never stooped to any unfairness or recriminations, because he never believed that it could aid his cause. There was a large charitableness about him. He was always fair. He was always willing to give his fellow men the same opportunity to express their views as he had for himself, even though those views differed from his. His memory will always be dear to us."

Why Be a Christian?

MOORLAND, IA., March 10, 1895.

REV. B. F. MILLS, Dear Sir: You say a man should be a Christian in order to be reasonable, i. e. (governed by reason—just). Now this may be so to a man of narrow mind, or one who "looks up his reason and studies theology." I am surprised that a man of your intellectual caliber would make such a statement.

Man has been defined as a rational animal—has he? In what book and chapter of the Bible did you find that? Or is it something theology has purloined from science?

So you are certain God has given us reason—I am not—and expects us to use it. Too bad! Another one of his mistakes. To expect us to use our reason and still be Christians!

You say reasonableness and righteousness are the same thing. I would advise you to consult Webster's dictionary. If reasonableness, righteousness, and godliness lead in the same path, whither do they lead? I should judge, from appearances, to the church, where a good many of the so-called godly people put on its cloak to help them out in their devilishness, business, etc. As to its leading further than that you or I have no positive proof.

Second. "To be manly, you must be a Christian." I beg leave to differ from you there. A man to be manly must be brave and noble (Webster). Now a manly man is one who has the moral courage to assert his honest opinion under any circumstances. The orthodox Christian has been defined as a living fossil, imbedded in the rock called faith. (Faith, a mixture of insanity and ignorance.)

So you think God directs the footsteps of man? He must be a poor guide, as so few go in the straight and narrow path.

The third "reason why you should be a Christian is because God's work needs you." Yes, God's work does need all the help it can get, for it is in deuced bad shape. Poor God! He has been trying several different schemes in the last 6,000 years to rope in the unwary, but his little confidence game wouldn't work. Ah! Happy thought! He sent his ill-begotten son to establish his kingdom here upon earth. Perhaps he was getting old and feeble, and thought it about time the boy was making his mark.

You assert, "The call that is brought to us to-day for the sake of the present and future generations [this looks awfully like counting chickens before they are hatched] and the world, to be given entirely to God." Suppose, for the sake of argument, God did make the world, wouldn't it look rather silly to make him a present of something that was his already? But possibly he may have lost it, having so many worlds to look after. If so, he would hardly recognize it now, as it used to be flat in his time.

Fourth. "Moses was a wise man, and yet it was said of him that he would rather suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasure of sin for a season." Was Moses suffering the affliction of the people of God or enjoying the pleasures of sin for a season when he killed the Egyptian and hid him in the sand (Ex. ii, 12), and then sneaked off into another land, and made a bargain with the old man to go back and "spoil" the Egyptians? (Ex. iii, 22).

"I would rather have the worst that could come to a Christian than the best that could come to a Christless man. I would rather be a pauper," etc. "see my friend die, or reputation blasted [I don't doubt it], if I were able to say, as Job, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,'" etc. So you are not dead sure of it after all? I thought by your previous assertions that you were.

Fifth. "Reason why you should make this choice is that you may have a good hope [a hope! I should think you would want a surety] of everlasting life. I want this. I believe it is the noblest ambition that stirs the breast of man. I am not ashamed to say it." So you are not ashamed to trample under your feet all that goes to make up an honorable man for a hope, a mere hope, of everlasting life.

"Finally, you should be a Christian and should become one instantly, for the time is short. Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation," etc. This has been sung for thousands of years, and probably will be, as long as there is a "sky pilot" left.

J. E. ST. CROIX.

Would be Utterly Vicious Without Christ.

MR. EDITOR: The Baptist is the largest of the ten churches in Amesbury, and its pastor, George F. Babbitt, is said to be the "smartest minister in town." I have never heard him speak, but from what members of his congregation tell me, I am led to believe that he is a great "blower," especially when denouncing Freethinkers, which he does often. His hatred of them reached white-heat a few weeks ago, and he boldly challenged any Infidel in the town to come on to his platform for a joint debate. Having heard of it a few days after, I sent him a short note politely accepting the challenge. Did he make arrangements for a debate? No; but, instead sent me a long letter declining my offer. His letter is too long to give in full, but among other things he said: "It is impossible for an Atheist to discuss the problems of Infidelity as an Infidel, . . . the difference in the order or quality of their minds being radical in respect to spiritual questions. Infidelity is confusion of mind, but Atheism is destitution of soul."

It is required that there should be the best trained men, men with the most perfect judicial sense and discipline, not only on the part of the contestants, but on the part of those before whom the case is argued. . . . Reason why an Atheist cannot debate the questions that might lie within the domain of Infidelity: He is a 'fool!' For the fool hath said in his heart there is no God! . . . Of course you cannot see this, for you cannot see anything straight in the spiritual world. When told that, in addition to the fact that you were an Atheist, you were somewhat unbalanced, the possibility of a joint debate was out of the question. . . . The reason why I personally could not debate with an Atheist is, that it would put me in a position of self-contradiction as a teacher that the Bible is the Word of God, and is to be obeyed in 'all matters of faith and practice.' This Bible says, specifically, that one shall 'not answer a fool after his own folly.' . . . By your very nature you cannot know the truth. . . . By nature and early training nothing would afford me greater exhilaration than to meet you before a public audience, under the severe conditions of parliamentary debate, and tan your hide for public amusement. As to the scope of the matter to be covered, an Atheist would have the opportunity of his life to spatter the hearers all over with these inanities that would smirch like mud, and to wash them off would take more time than a pastor has at his disposal. . . . I believe in Jesus Christ, even as the very son of God, and take him away and you would drive me into every form of license."

It seems he felt obliged to forego the pleasure of tanning my hide in order to prevent the scripture quotations from smirching like mud. I have no doubt it would have taken him some time to free the minds of his people from the impressions I would have left on them. I sent him the following letter the next day:

GEO. F. BABBITT, Dear Sir: Your letter received. I am sorry you decline to meet me in joint debate, but it is no more than I expected. I did, however, think you would offer a better excuse than you do for declining. Not having heard your challenge from your own lips, it is only natural that it should have reached me in a different form from what it was when originally thrown out, especially as it was conveyed to me by one of your church members, who ought not to be expected to listen to much of what the minister is saying. But it makes no difference to me whether it was the whole system of Christianity, or only the point you mention, which was to be under consideration. I would gladly accept the challenge in either case, and it could not alter the nature of your reply, which bars me out of any religious discussion with you. As is the case with ministers generally, you use many words to express a very few thoughts. I have read your letter carefully several times in order to discover your real reason for declining my offer, and, after much sifting, I find the reasons as you give them are these:

I do not possess the "proper qualifications" for the following reasons:

First, because I am an Atheist, and not an Infidel.

Second, because I am "a fool without sense."

Third, because the "Bible says, specifically, that one shall 'not answer a fool after his own folly.'"

Laying aside the fact that the language you use is not very complimentary to myself, or very becoming to a servant of the "meek and lowly Jesus," I will consider your reasons briefly.

It is a very easy way to back down from your position by saying that I do not possess the "proper qualifications," but it will appear to the public, I believe, as a very weak excuse. Are you afraid to debate with anyone who will not promise to agree with you? You might challenge Dr. Talmage. No doubt you could defend Christianity from what he would say in opposition to it, better than you could from the attacks of an Atheist. A member of your congregation informs me that you frequently denounce Mr. Ingersoll. That is a perfectly safe thing to do as long as he is a thousand miles away, but what would you think to see Mr. Ingersoll in your pulpit, if you are afraid to meet one "of much less caliber?"

The difference between an Atheist and an Infidel is not as great as you are trying to make it appear. The Dictionary before me gives the following definitions: "Atheist, one who disbelieves the existence of a God." "Infidel, an unbeliever; one who denies the scriptures and Christianity." In the sense that Infidelity is unfaithfulness to a trust, I certainly would not care to be called an Infidel, but as the word is generally used as applied to skeptics, the difference between an Atheist and an Infidel is not as great as the difference between a Baptist and a Methodist.

Your refusal to debate with me because I am an Atheist rather than an Infidel, is mere bosh. Because I am "a fool without sense." It seems to me you are taking considerable responsibility upon yourself to pass judgment so hastily, considering that I am an entire stranger whom you have never heard speak. You say that "it is required that there should be the best trained men, men with the most perfect judicial sense and discipline, not only on the part of the contestants, but on the part of those before whom the case is argued." I will not comment on your unmitigated conceit in placing yourself so far above me in "judicial sense and discipline," but will say that the remark is not very complimentary to your congregation which was to be the judge before whom the case was to be argued. Why are you afraid to have the case argued before your own people? I am perfectly willing that they decide which one of us is the most lacking in "sense." You say you believe in Jesus Christ as the son of God. Remember, then, that it was Jesus who said, "But whosoever shall say, 'Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.'"

The last reason you give is, perhaps, the weakest of all, for it brings to mind what a book of falsehoods, contradictions, and absurdities the Bible is. You could not debate with me because the Bible tells you to "answer not a fool after his own folly," and in the next verse of the same chapter you are told just as specifically to "answer a fool according to his folly." Which is right? And yet that is only one of more than an hundred direct contradictions in that strange book, not to mention the cruelties, vulgarities, absurdities, and impossibilities.

I have briefly considered the reasons which you mention for declining my offer, and yet the real reason, I think, you have kept to yourself. You are afraid to have your congregation hear the truth. It is not much of a compliment to their intelligence, and yet I believe it is the truth that not one in fifty of the members of your church knows what a contemptible old sham the Bible is. You know all about it, but you get your living out of the ignorance and credulity of others, consequently it is simply business for you to "pull the wool over their eyes."

On the words of this anonymous book you base your present faith and hope of future happiness. This book which represents your God as the debaucher of a woman, you look to as a moral guide! Take away Jesus Christ and you say you will be driven into every form of license. Well! If I ever become so degraded that the hope of heaven and fear of hell are all that keep me in the paths of virtue, I hope I shall at least have pride enough not to admit it. Are you sure those hell fire doctrines of Jesus will always keep you from going astray? The fact that they are a very weak restraint generally, is strikingly illustrated by statistics, which show that more crimes are committed by ministers, in proportion to their number, than by any other class of people.

Now, sir, in closing, allow me to give you a little bit of advice: Denounce Freethought, Atheism, Infidelity, or anything else which seeks to give men mental liberty, just as much as you please, but be careful in the future about throwing out your challenges for joint debates, and it may save you the disgrace of making a cowardly backdown. Whenever you feel like showing your ability to "pulverize" the Infidels of this community, remember that there is one man, at least, ready and willing to meet you with the proof that Christianity, and the book upon which it is founded, are false, immoral, cruel, and tyrannical.

Hoping you will be honest enough to renounce your religion, as many ministers already have, I remain, with all the respect I can force myself to feel,

Yours truly, J. A. WILSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communication for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The School-Boy.

We bought him a box for his books and toys,
And a cricket bag for his bat.
And he looked the brightest and best of boys
Under the new straw hat.

We handed him into the railway train,
With a troop of his young compeers,
And we made as though it were dust and rain
Were filling our eyes with tears.

We looked in his innocent face to see
The sign of a sorrowful heart;
But he only shouldered his bat with glee,
And wondered when they would start

'Twas not that he loved not as heretofore,
For the boy was tender and kind;
But his was a world that was all before,
And ours was a world behind.

'Twas not his fluttering heart was cold,
For the child was loyal and true;
And the parents' love the love that is old,
And the children's love that is new.

And we came to know that love is a flower,
Which only groweth down;
And we scarcely spoke for the space of an hour
As we drove back through the town.

Correspondence.

CHARLES CITY, IA., March 11, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: This is my first letter to the Children's Corner. My step-father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner. I am nine years old. I have a sister older than I am. Her name is Rosalind. I go to school and study reading, arithmetic, and spelling. I am in the second primer B class, and will soon pass into the A class.

If any little girl would like to correspond with me, I would gladly answer.

Your Liberal friend, NEVA TITUS.

JERSEY CITY, N. J., March 4, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl, eight years old. I have a little brother and sister. My sister's name is Fanny Mildred and my brother's name is Charles Voltaire. I have a little brother dead, whose name was Howard Ingersoll. Both of my brothers were named after good men. I look at the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, although I don't understand them. Papa reads THE TRUTH SEEKER, and likes it very much. He goes to Mr. Ingersoll's lectures and thinks a great deal of him.

I think this is enough for this time; next time I might have something more to say.

ELSIE MURVILL.

CROSBY, TEX., Feb. 10, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw my sister's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I thought I would write. We have no school here at present, but hope we will have one soon. It is very lonesome here; not many living in this place. We have had a heavy snow. I reckon God sent it to kill off the stock, but I guess the Christians would call it one of God's merciful acts to kill the worms and grasshoppers. To-day is Sunday, and the preachers are all snowed in, so they can't preach. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I have a good laugh over the cartoons every week. F. M. HARVEY.

[It is too bad there is no school in that neighborhood, but you must study at home. —Ed. C. C.]

BUTLER, PA., Jan. 6, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl only eleven years of age. I go to school and, when at home, I play school with my brothers and sisters. I am the teacher, but I never teach them anything about God, for I know nothing about him myself, except what a neighbor's little girl told me over two years ago. She said that God made the world. Then I asked who made God, and she said she did not know, but thought his folks had made him. Then I asked her who made his folks, but she could not tell. My little brother said she got stuck. I was never at church but once; then I went to see the Christmas-tree at the Episcopal church, and I was so tickled to see the preacher in kilts. I know a Catholic lady who is so afraid when a storm comes that she prays with all her might, and says, "By Jesus, I stand; by God, I love you."

My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we are all Freethinkers.

IRENE FULLERTON.

[Dear Irene, those questions have been asked over and over again, and they never have been satisfactorily answered—and they never can be. The best way is to confine our questions to reasonable subjects, that can be reasonably discussed. Then we shall have plain sailing. We would not be surprised if Irene becomes a teacher in earnest some day, and she will undoubtedly be an excellent one, as Liberal-minded instructors usually are. —Ed. C. C.]

PUEBLO, COL., Feb. 5, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend of Humanity: After waiting for many months to hear from my last offering to the Children's Corner, I conclude you did not get it. When I read your letters describing your trip to the West and saw you had passed through this place, I could have cried. Had I known of it I should have been to the depot to say, "Hail and farewell," if no more. Your letters were grand, as they always are, and I am sure that the children everywhere enjoyed them as I did. I wish, though, you could have had more time, so your friends could have had you with them at the different places you passed. I hope you can go again, and if so be sure to announce it some weeks before, so we can tell you of our whereabouts. It is not to be expected that you could remember so many of us, that is, where we are.

The Children's Corner improves, but how I wish the children could have a whole paper to themselves, as they could if money was more plentiful. But I see my letter is running on like a summer stream.

With best wishes for you and all I am your sincere friend,

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

[We will try to see you when we pass that way again. Meantime our thoughts may run to and fro, like a "summer stream." —Ed. C. C.]

HOOPESTON, ILL.

MY DEAR AUNT SUSIE: You will no doubt be surprised to hear from me, as it has been several years since I last wrote. We have had some lovely skating. Papa, Ida, and I went skating yesterday, so of course we are tired to-day. I suppose you have had both sleighing and skating at your home, have you not? Although it is a dull, gloomy day, I went to church and Sunday-school at the Universalist church; the minister of the church taught the class I was in, and it was saddening to hear the way he talked. In speaking of King Herod, he said, "If he lived now he would be called a bum," and farther on he spoke of this king as being "tipsy." Rather a reckless way for a minister of the gospel to talk—don't you think so?

I shall go to college at the end of the present term of school and will be graduated when I am eighteen. I suppose the next question will be, How old am I now? Well, I guess you know, as you saw me at the convention.

I should like very much to hear Colonel Ingersoll lecture.

With love and best wishes to yourself and sister, I remain, Your niece, OLLIE JOHNSTON.

[It is a great pleasure to hear from Ollie once more, and may it not be a great while before she writes again. —Ed. C. C.]

MIDWAY, KY., Feb. 18, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Though small it may seem to some, there was something strikingly beautiful in those words of Frances Wright, who, when checked in her eager inquiries concerning the philosophy of human life, replied, "Can truth be dangerous?"

It is the evolution of this question to-day that has brought about such a marked revolution in the world of thought. And although the change is not as great as we would wish—for superstition is so comforting, so enchanting to the masses, that it is indeed hard to part with it—nevertheless, Freethought is gaining ground, the ministers do not control the mind of the people as they once did, the Bible has not the hold on the preacher it once had, and heaven no longer assumes to dictate the affairs of men. We are discarding the divine mysteries of supernaturalism, and beginning to learn something about human nature. Life is too short to dwell on the inspired cruelty of the Old Testament, or the ignorance and bigotry of the New, when we have the privilege of reading Shakespeare and Darwin. We cannot afford to waste any of our time on the age-honored myths and hoary superstitions of the dead past, when there is a living world teeming with art and science and beauty—a living world of men and women, against whose hearts the waves of passion beat, hurrying on, some to victory, others to shame and despair.

There is more glory, more real grandeur, in the twinkling of a star, or the sparkling of a pebble at ebb tide, than in all the Bibles that avarice and superstition have ever dictated to the diseased minds of men.

Helen H. Gardener says: "There are just two strong props under the pulpit to-day—the sentiment of women and the ignorance of children," and we might add with propriety, the hypocritical cant of men. The average man (at least, I find it so where I live) is scarcely less religious than the average woman, but women being in a greater degree the slaves of conventionality, dare not speak for fear of social ostracism. Many women are proud of being considered inferior beings, simply because the Bible tells them they are.

Admitting for a moment that the Bible is true, surely woman has something to be proud of. She was the first to drive from the garden of Eden the phantom of superstition. The first to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge!

Rev. Anna Shaw must have thought of that at the Atlanta convention, when she began her prayer with "Almighty God, our heavenly father and mother." His lordship must have felt pretty queer at being addressed in that new fashion. I wonder that the angels did not cry out against such blasphemy.

It is marvelous the many interpretations the scriptures will admit of, according to the peculiar belief and prejudices of the individual. No wonder the Irishman said: "The Bible is just like a fiddle. You can play any tune on it you please."

The scriptures were written by ignorant and designing priests who had their own aggrandizement in view; and it is very unjust, the way the Protestants hate the Catholics, when they are indebted to them for every word of their Bible and Christianity.

Just as sure as the Catholic church goes, the Protestant will follow. Both are bad, immoral, and unjust. The thought of the world is turning against a religion of faith and fear. As Colonel Ingersoll says: "The church is dying of dry rot." Religion has many dupes to-day. But superstition is no longer king of kings and lord of lords. The Bible has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Science has risen, and Freethought has sent her glittering message across the wires of time.

Well, I must close. With love for yourself and the boys and girls,

Truly your friend, MAY COLLINS.

Pen Pictures of the World's Fair.

By S. P. Putnam.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume. —Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done full and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers. —Boston Investigator.

A NEW GOSPEL OF LABOR. The Only Peaceable and Practical Solution of the Labor Question, and Thorough Remedy Against Hard Times. By A. Roadmaker. Seattle: S. Wegener. Paper, octavo, 229 pp. Price, 50 cents.

The author starts out with the report of an interview with a president of the United States, in which it is shown that the greatest obstacle in the way of a redress of the grievances of the wage-earning classes is their failure to agree as to the cause of the prevailing discontent in their ranks. The president's expressions, of which A. Roadmaker's own experience compelled him to admit the great force, led him to conclude that the first step towards a solution of the industrial question must be to give the working people the information that would enable them to tell "what they want." Probably few agitators will dispute this proposition, but when the writer says that his book contains just the information desired and that no other contains it he says no more than any other economic reformer will claim with equal confidence for his panacea. No doubt a few who read the book will find in it new ideas which they will accept, but the majority, the overwhelming majority, will read it only for the purpose of discovering wherein it agrees with or differs from their own established opinion, and to commend or condemn it as the balance is one way or the other. A. Roadmaker forgets in his enthusiasm that the other schools of economic thought or feeling do not agree with him that they do not know what they want—on the contrary, they are sure that they do know what they want and how to get it, and each school thinks that the great obstacle in the way is the stupidity of the adherents of the other schools. The real difficulty is not that all these workers do not know what they want, for they do, but that what they want would not be good for them if they could get it. Each contingent will admit that this is true of all the others. It is probable this is what A. Roadmaker meant to say, and that his purpose is to show them, not what they want, but what they should want.

A. Roadmaker's plan is, in brief, the creation of a cabinet Department of Labor, at the head of which is the Secretary of Labor. His first duty will be the gathering of labor statistics, and the next the assisting in the formation of national and local Producers' Unions. Any local union belonging to a national Producers' Union shall be entitled to financial aid from the United States treasury. For each such local union the Secretary of Labor shall appoint a government agent as book keeper at a salary of $1,500 per year. The local union will give the government a mortgage on its lands, shops, buildings, farm, mine, or other means of labor. The aid rendered shall be in the form of government bills, to be known as United States Producers' Notes. These notes will not be redeemable in coin, but will be a lien upon the lands, buildings, plant, etc., upon which the government has its mortgage, will be received for customs, taxes, and duties, and be full legal tender. When these notes, together with the present notes and coin money of the United States shall reach the sum of $40 per capita, the old money is to be called in and demonetized in the ratio that new Producers' Notes are made, until they form the sole money of the country, to be increased as the population and industries of the country increase. These loans are to bear interest at the rate of one per cent. per annum. The wages to be paid to the members of a national Producers' Union, as subdivided in its local unions, are to be established by the national executive committee, which is to consist of delegates from the different locals, and shall meet in Washington as soon as a national Producers' Union has commenced to work under this law, and at stated intervals thereafter. No wages shall amount to more than $1,000 per year, save officers', which may be higher. The executive committee of each national Producers' Union is to regulate the hours of labor for its members, and the amount of commodities to be produced by each local union. It shall also provide for full wage pensions to aged or disabled workers and to families bereft of their supporters. The measures of each national executive committee are to be revised by the central national committee, consisting of the presidents of all the national Producers' Unions, this committee to all reside in Washington. It is the duty of this committee to propose to Congress changes in laws, including the tariff. Local unions borrowing from the government must not borrow elsewhere. Local unions may suspend members who endanger the welfare of the union; a national Producers' Union (through its executive committee) can suspend a local union, and may itself be suspended by the central national committee. All suspended persons or bodies have the right of appeal to the next higher body, and the final appeal is to the Secretary of Labor. Only citizens of the United States can become members. For the first three years after the passage of this act only unions composed of coal-miners can secure loans; after that period of time the privilege will be available for workmen of all classes. All laws giving away, selling, or in other ways disposing of farm lands, wood or coal lands, water-right, or other natural resources now in possession of the United States are declared null and void, and hereafter all such property shall be leased out free of cost to the different national Producers' Unions organized under this act. The price which any union is to charge for its product is to be equal to the cost of production, these elements entering into the computation: 1. The salary of the agent. 2. The wages of all workers, officers, and pensioners, including what is paid to widows and orphans. 3. The cost of medical attendance of workmen falling sick or becoming injured in consequence of their occupation as union members. 4. The interest on the capital borrowed from the government. 5. Wear- and tear-percentage sufficient to keep all plants in good repair and to renovate the same. 6. The cost of all auxiliary materials, taxes, insurance, and similar expenses incurred in carrying on the national work of production. 7. A wear- and tear-percentage equal to the diminishing value of land, mines, minerals, or other natural resources caused by exhausting the same. This percentage to be paid by the local unions to the government once a year, the notes so paid in to be destroyed, so as to keep the value of the union's property and the government loan on the same properly adjusted.

There you have A. Roadmaker's scheme in a nutshell. Of a certainty it will not be approved by the Single Taxers, nor the State Socialists, nor by the Revolutionary Anarchist-Communists, nor the Philosophical Anarchists, neither by the Silver Monometallists, nor the Gold Monometallists, nor the Bimetallists, nor yet even by the men of the three parties who are now in the lead, and we are certain that the Prohibitionists will set their faces like flint against it if brewers are allowed to form unions and borrow money from the government. Perhaps you will like to study the matter some more before you give your final decision, and in that event we will send you a copy of Mr. Roadmaker's book on the same terms that we will sell you any other book—that is, on receipt of the retail price.

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE BETTER WORLD A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

So said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Gems of Thought.

BLANK pessimism is the one creed possible for all save fools.—Grant Allen.

IN every epoch of disintegration public opinion was ever the cataract that roared toward the brink and plunged into abyssal ruin.—Amos Waters.

ALL the good in religion is not religion, but morality, benevolence, love, culture, music, art, etc., all anteceding and surviving any special religion.—Otto Wettstein.

THE republican form of government is the highest form of government, but because of this it requires the highest type of human nature—a type nowhere at present existing.—Herbert Spencer.

FREEDOM is for society, as for the individual, the necessary condition precedent to the solution of practical problems, both as allowing natural forces to develop themselves, and as exhibiting their spontaneous tendencies; but it is not in itself the solution.—Professor Ingham.

WHEN the Catholic church encroaches, strike it at the point of encroachment. When any church, any institution, any class, encroaches, meet it at the point of assault. When balance, poise, judgment, is lost, when the territory of one is ruthlessly invaded by another, repel the invasion, but do not in turn invade. Do not murder your neighbor because you think he will murder you. Do not murder him because his grandfather murdered yours. Give equal liberty everywhere. In the splendor of that liberty invasion will be self-repelled.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE wonderful old man! [Voltaire.] When he was past eighty years of age he set to work, like another Jeremy Bentham, to abolish the admission of hearsay evidence into French legal proceedings. But his great work was that by his wit and irony he broke down the principle of authority which had been so foully abused in France. Would the most strictly religious man wish to see religion as it was in France in the eighteenth century? Would the greatest stickler for authority wish to find a country governed as France was governed in the days of Voltaire?—Alexander A. Knux.

THERE is no difference between the plain speech in many classic works and in those which have been lately [1878] condemned as immoral, and no difference is alleged between the motives with which they are all published. The book may be very able in one case, very poor in another, but the principle of freedom and right protects them equally. To contend that a book which is decent for the rich becomes indecent when priced within reach of the poor, is a mere insult to the people; it is on a par with the religion which regards subscribers to the Zoological Gardens on Sunday as pious people, whereas sixpence would make them Sabbath-breakers.—Moncure D. Conway.

WALT WHITMAN is placed in very good company by going on the Episcopal church's Index Expurgatorius. Here, also, are a few of the names from that of the church of Rome: Catullus, Dante, Abelard, D'Aubigné, Bayle, Isaac Casanbon, Condillac, old Antony a Wood, Voltaire, Rousseau, Rochefoucauld, Rabelais, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Petronius Arbiter, Congreve and Wechery, Beaumont and Fletcher, Mrs. Behm, Robert Herrick, La Fontaine, Bossuet, Luther, Erasmus, Melancthon, Huss, Madame Guyon, Fénelon, Hobbes, Bacon, Balsac, Böhme, Boileau, Comte, Professor J. W. Draper, Sterne, Döllinger, Hume, Swift, Junius, Kepler, Lessing, Leopardi, Pascal, Rosmini, George Sand, Spinoza. Where is the craven soul that would not prefer to go to sheol in this illustrious company than to heaven with Torquemada and his gang of pale-gilled wielders of red-hot pincers and nail-extractors?—Wm. Sloane Kennedy.

HUSH, Christian! speak in bated tones
Of Druids' worship round their gory stones!
The founder of thy creed
Died with despairing groans.
Within thy book we read
God bade his own son bleed,
A human sacrifice! But blood might plead
With the Omnipotent for sinners' need.
Years rolled away; again the pious priest
Spread for his Moloch the Satanic feast;
Fires mantled round the quailing, quivering frame,
Fierce scorching God's true son e'en in his father's name!
Christian, thine idol 'twas whose fêted fane
Reeked with the blood of innocents; their pain
Gave a fresh thrill of rapture to the Hells,
Where, bloated with his bliss, thy brain-born image dwells.
Come, brother men, together let us weep
That men can be so cruel to their kin;
Love gives all vengeance an eternal sleep,
And damns not erring as a mortal sin.
—Robert B. Holt.

PIANOS! PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

ALAS, THE COOKS AND SPARROWS!

The following suggestive letter in the interest of Sabbath observance, comes to the Listener from a worthy lady of his acquaintance:

DEAR LISTENER: While the Sunday Protective League members are doing much fearful and wonderful work, yet there are a few little points they have overlooked, in their noble task of stopping all the unnecessary things on Sunday. It is painful to have to reveal the sad, sad fact that many members of the very Sunday Protective League itself are openly encouraging, countenancing, and paying for totally unnecessary Sunday performances of labor. For instance, the cooking of meats, vegetables, gravies, tea, coffee, and so on, obliging maid-servants to break one of the most sacred laws of the Sabbath!

That excellent pietist from India, Mr. Gandhi, who is now undertaking to spiritualize Bostonians, presents himself as a living proof that it is not in the least necessary to eat cooked food at any time, much less on Sunday. Nuts and fruits are quite enough to sustain life during that sacred day, even for sinners, now dwelling on the low, material plane of week-day meat-eating. Will you not urge this point upon the S. P. L., and impress upon them the awful example of wrong-doing which they will continue to set before the community until the cook-fire ceases to burn and the cook-girl ceases to labor in their abodes on Sunday?

Another glaring case of Sunday excursions, noise, gaiety, and frolic, often terribly annoying to the devout worshippers in Sunday churches, and yet entirely unchecked by the S. P. L., is that of some terribly saucy and aggressive foreign colonists in our midst, who have so little reverence for the Puritan Sabbath that they actually invade the very porticos of the churches with their noise and chatter while divine service is in progress! It is an outrage that these should be permitted to carry on their imitation of a continental Sunday—a day almost wholly given to the pursuit of happiness!—over the very tombstones of the Puritans. I refer, of course, to the European sparrows, whose irreverence (especially at King's Chapel, Park Street Church, and some other sacred places) actually tempts one to believe them animated by personal contempt for pietism.

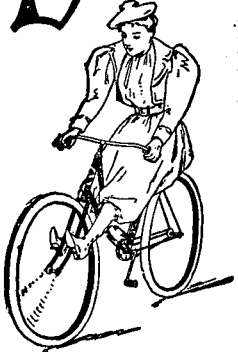

The free, bold flight of these Sunday excursionists, undoubtedly, has a stimulating effect upon the restless spirit of those ignorant people who try to escape from the city on Sunday, and betake themselves to still waters and green pastures in out-of-town places. Indeed, I have actually known one of these people to excuse himself on the plea that it was as natural for man, as for the sparrows, to seek the open air, the blue sky, the glorious trees on Sunday. I blush to tell that this shamefully audacious wretch even exclaimed, "Necessary! necessary! Who is to judge what each man finds necessary?" and, pointing to King's Chapel, this monster of iniquity affirmed, "I say, Sunday excursions are a thousand times more necessary than the deadly dull performances going on every seventh day in that musty, old assembling place of dry-bones." He would not listen to my horrified protest, but went on. "Consider the slaves of the factory, the shop, the office, thousands of whom work in basements, or in dark rooms which never see sunlight, for six days of the week; and then ask yourself what one single semblance of common sense is there in compelling these people to remain in city boarding-houses, in attics, in stums, on their one day of well-earned freedom. They won't go to the Sunday Protective League's churches if they stay in town. And what advantage has the United States over Russia, anyway, if one set of people are to be allowed to forcibly restrain the innocent motif of another set on their weekly holiday?"

At this, dear Listener, I was so shocked that I refused to hear any more. But I have told you enough to show you how much mischief the Sunday freedom of the sparrows and the Sunday freedom of the Sunday Protective League is causing. If the S. P. L. would only let the public feel sure, beyond doubt, that every cook and every cook-stove is given a calm, motionless, Sabbatical rest on the day the Sunday Protective League wishes to reduce to a state of quiescent passivity; and if the S. P. L. would at once begin a crusade to promote Sunday observance among the flauntingly—yes, the indecently—irreverent sparrows, then, in time, we might hope to restore the beautiful Sunday (or was it Saturday?) depicted in Exodus xxxi, 15, "Whosoever doeth any work in the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death."

In the meantime, dear Listener, will you please call upon the Sunday Protective League to explain whether or no the preacher's work on Sunday, the church janitor's, the organist's and the choir's can be considered work; for, observe, the decree does not specify "necessary" work, it says "any work," and, as the above are all paid for their services, shall we not have to consider that "work?" And, if they are doing work on the Sabbath day, must the punishment prescribed in Exodus fall on them?

The bare suggestion is terrifying, but all this Sabbath and Sunday business is so confusing that one does not really know what conclusions one ought to draw, when starting out from the standpoint of Exodus. Hoping you will call upon the Sunday Protective League for fuller explanations, dear Listener, I am is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clap-net, but only in WISDOM—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, irritated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. News of the Week.

It has been decided to have a world's fair in Montreal in 1896.

AUGUSTA and Columbus, Ga., were swept by cyclones on March 20.

THERE was a snow storm in Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Virginia, March 20.

THE late leader of the clerical party in the Prussian upper house, Freiherr Von Schorlemer-Alst, died March 17.

THE German Reichstag, by a vote of 163 to 146, rejected a resolution congratulating Prince Bismarck on his birthday.

Two hundred Negroes set sail from Savannah for Liberia on March 19; they are the advance guard of a colony.

Two boats on the Rhine near Lobith conveying dynamite were blown up and twenty-five persons killed, it is reported.

THE cornerstone of a monument to Garibaldi, to commemorate the defense of the city in 1849, was laid in Rome on March 18th.

THE House of Representatives failed to make an appropriation for the payment of the Bering Sea fisheries awards, as we agreed to do.

It is the consensus of opinion that the "reform" legislature of New Jersey, just adjourned, was no improvement on its predecessor.

MARSHAL PRINCE KOMATSU has been made chief of all Japanese armies. This is supposed to indicate the approaching end of the war.

THE discovery of a conspiracy to proclaim Gen. Antonio Ezeta president of San Salvador led to the summary execution of all the implicated leaders.

THE New Orleans grand jury has indicted twenty white men for the murder of the Negro stevedores recently killed by mobs of river laborers.

THE latest reports put the number of Armenians massacred by the Kurds and Turks in Moosh at 8,000. It is stated that not a soldier was killed.

A FIRE in a tenement house having no fire escapes caused the death of two men in this city on March 20, besides putting many more lives in peril.

ON March 24 the St. James Hotel in Denver burned and four firemen were killed by falling through the floor of the rotunda to the basement.

THE Spaniards recently defeated the Malay Mussulmans on the island of Mindanao, the Philippines, the Sultan and his son being among the killed.

COMMISSIONER of Street Cleaning Waring has appointed Charles A. Meade Superintendent of Final Disposition. Meade is twenty-two years of age, a graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and started in here as a driver, but his promotion has been very rapid.

It is rumored that rich gold fields have been found on the San Juan River, between Utah and New Mexico. These are in the shape of placer deposits.

THE falling of a wall caused by the burning of the roundhouse at Toledo, Ohio, of the Wabash road, resulted in the death of three men and the injury of nine, some of it is thought fatally.

QUEEN VICTORIA has given her consent to the law conferring full suffrage on the women of South Australia. It is considered odd that she should have anything to say in the matter.

A PASSENGER train was held up by train robbers near Victor, Col., on March 23. The leader is an ex-deputy sheriff and ex-deputy United States marshal, and three others are believed to be ex-deputy sheriffs.

THE books of the institution appear to show that it has cost Illinois at least $77 per month for each inmate of the state Home for Juvenile Female Offenders. The investigation reveals a deplorable condition of affairs.

FOUR men have been indicted for manslaughter in connection with the collapse of the Orchard street tenement house in this city by which four lives were lost. They are the builders, owner, and city building inspector.

THE extraordinary grand jury of New York city has returned indictments against about a dozen police officers, including Inspector McLaughlin and several captains. They were arrested, and released on bail, in sums ranging from $2,500 to $20,000.

THE extraordinary grand jury brought in indictments against twenty-two persons for violation of the election laws in this city at the last general election. Those arrested were admitted to bail in $2,500 each, with the exception of two, whose bail was fixed at $1,000 each.

THERE was a million-dollar fire in Armourdale, Kan., on March 24. It was the packing plant of Reid Brothers, of Kansas City, Mo., and nothing was saved but the beef storage building. Sixteen acres were burned over; the water pressure was totally ineffectiv. The average number of hands employed was 1,100.

THE Mexican court which has been investigating the accident on the Inter-oceanic railroad whereby 150 lives were lost has found the engineer, Neuffer, responsible, and ordered the company to produce him. He has fled to the United States, having been shot at while trying to rescue passengers from the wreck.

LI HUNG CHANG, Chinese peace envoy to Japan, was shot by a Japanese youth and wounded in the face while returning to his hotel in Shimonoseki from a conference with the Japanese peace commissioners. The would-be assassin was promptly arrested, and high Japanese officials have hastened to visit Li Hung Chang with expressions of regret. It is not known how serious is the wound of the viceroy.

THE reports from the seat of hostilities in Cuba continue to be contradictory. There are stories of many "battles" and the victory is uniformly with the side that sends the news, so we have two defeats and two victories at every engagement. It is stated that 8,000 more soldiers from Spain will reach Cuba by the first of April.

BRIGADIER-GEN. ADAM BADEAU died at Ridgewood, N. J., March 19. He was born in New York city Dec. 29, 1831. He was long on the staff of General Grant and also filled important places in the diplomatic and civil service. He published several books about Grant and assisted the general in the preparation of his autobiography.

Two members of Daniel Webster lodge of the Free Sons of Israel, of this city, were arrested for participation in a theatrical entertainment given by the lodge on Sunday night, March 17th. Counsel for the men will try to get a special act through the legislature excepting from the operation of the Sunday law such concerts and entertainments.

IN accordance with the decision of the English Privy Council, the Governor-General of Canada has ordered the province of Manitoba to restore separate (Catholic) schools. Premier Greenway, of Manitoba, and his ministers declare that they will not obey the order. It looks seriously like open conflict between the Dominion and the province.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON is at the head of a committee of women charged with the task of getting out a revision of the Bible which will show the mistranslations in other editions, so far as woman is concerned. It seems to be the notion of the committee that the "we" in Genesis includes the "motherhood of god," instead of the polytheism of the writer, as is undoubtedly the case. This is another instance of attempting to read into the scriptures what the reader-in wants there.

NEARLY every one of the one thousand men who constitute the governing power in Hawaii is either a military or civil officeholder. The governed number about 100,000. When the American flag was flying over the government buildings all the lands of the natives were appropriated and were not returned to their owners when the home government took charge. This practically reduces the natives to serfdom. Three hundred political prisoners were sentenced to serve terms in the penitentiary, and about one hundred more were paroled or banished.

PROF. PETER H. VANDER WEYDE, a distinguished man of science, died at his home in New York on March 18. He was born in Nymegen, Holland, eighty-two years ago. The chair of Industrial Science was expressly created for him at Girard College in 1864. He was one of the editors of Appleton's American Encyclopedia, editor of the Manufacturer and Builder, took out over two hundred patents on inventions of his own, mostly electrical, was noted as a musician and composer, and was a painter of no mean merit. He wrote much for the scientific press, completing only a week before his death an article on modern electricity. Professor Vander Weyde was a radical Freethinker and for some years a prominent member of the Manhattan Liberal Club.

THERE is a very bad political crisis in Spain. Officers of the army became incensed against the utterances of the Republican papers and mobbed the offices of some of them, including that of Castelar. The government could not control the army, the officers, from generals down, siding with the rioters. Then the ministry resigned. It did not dare to attempt the punishment of the offenders for fear of inciting a mutiny and endangering the monarchy. General Martinez de Campos, Captain General of Madrid, summoned the officers of the Madrid garrison to him and said: "If there is any further rioting on the part of the officers of this garrison they will have to meet me as an opponent." Later he received a deputation of journalists, to whom he said: "If you make any further attacks upon the army which incite a renewal of the recent rioting you will undoubtedly be shot." A military court at Barcelona has ordered that two directors of local newspapers be arrested for protesting against the excesses of the subalterns in Madrid. The journalists protest in vain against trial by military courts. There is a rigid consorship of press and dispatches; important news has to be sent by mail to Bayonne. Most of the newspapers offices were barricaded and defended by armed guards of civilians. The professor of history in the University of Madrid, a conspicuous author, wrote a letter to the Barcelona press dealing with the crisis, and had to flee to Portugal to avoid arrest by the military chiefs. Other writers have fled to France. Canovas del Castillo, Conservative, has formed a new ministry. Five of the nine ministers are Liberals.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

THE KIND OF REST THE SABBATARIANS WANT ON SUNDAY.

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

Prayer, and Cause and Effect.

"One of our most honored friends writes us: 'Please ask the "Sanitary" editor to expand the principle announced: "No matter how holy the cause in which we make our sacrifice, if we break the physical law we are punished as severely as if sensual gratification had been our only motiv." Are we to understand that what is called physical law is the test of duty, and that the patriot soldier, or the brave fireman, or the self-denying missionary, losing his life in his work, is punished for his sin? I am perplexed.'

"Yes, the same physical punishment for breach of physical law. But the physical law may be overborne by the moral law, as is implied in the words, 'No matter how holy the cause.' We assume that this is what the 'Sanitary' editor meant."—New York Independent.

But the sacredness of the cause in which the life is lost does not avail to suspend the operation of natural law, and it is this truth that ever confronts and confutes the Theist when he attempts to harmonize the theory of a moral ruler of the universe with the facts of that universe. As the Independent's editors admit, the character of the act or the intention of the actor cannot save the man who traverses natural law from the consequences of his act. Winds overturn, water drowns, avalanches bury, gas suffocates, fire consumes, poison disorganizes sinner and saint with strict impartiality. This fact of the inexorable march of cause and effect makes it impossible to show that prayer is ever answered, that man is in the care of an overruling providence. If a God exists he is as helpless as man, or he is immoral. The editor of the Independent would save the "patriot soldier," the "brave fireman," or the "self-denying missionary" if he could, but he cannot, for Nature does not cognize the quality of intentions. If "God" would save them, but is not able to do so, he is as impotent as the editor, and prayers to him are as foolish as would be prayers to the latter. If he could save them, but will not, he is immoral, and prayers to him are unavailing and a senseless waste of time and energy. One word as to terms: "Punishment" is not the right word to use when speaking of the results which follow ignorant contact with Nature—we simply suffer the consequences of our ignorance, or our inability to avoid the danger that we know lurks in our way. There is no question of punishment to be considered.

The Modern Protestant Inquisition.

It is one of the curiosities of our times that a Protestant sect is made the victim of other Protestant sects because it teaches that the Sabbath of the Bible is binding on the Christian conscience, while the Protestant sects that persecute it teach, in effect if not in terms, that the Sabbath of the Bible is no longer binding on the conscience of the Christian, but that the Sabbath of the Catholic church is binding on the Protestant as well as the Catholic Christian's conscience. This curious fact derives additional emphasis from the further fact that the Protestant holds that the authority of the church is a rope of sand unless interwoven with it is the authority of the scriptures, while the Catholic holds that the authority of his church rests solidly on the basis of tradition as well as of scripture, and that in the absence of the sanction of the latter the approval of the former is sufficient. It is ominous for the future of our country and of the civilization of the world that the Protestant sects that are at once the most aggressiv and the most powerful show themselves so willing to accept the authority of the Catholic church in a matter that so vitally affects the liberty and well-being of the people as does this Sunday question. If we admit that the church may determine how the citizen can spend one-seventh of his time we have admitted the entering wedge of priestly authority that will eventually split the fair tree of our civil liberties from lowermost root to topmost branch if we stand idly by—as most of the citizens of the United States have hitherto done—and permit the church-dominated legislators to drive home that wedge with the brutal maul of state power.

In 1892 there was established at Graysville, Rhea county, Tenn., an academy. It was founded by Elder G. W. Colcord, a Seventh Day Adventist minister. He was also a teacher, and invested in this academy all the money he could command, some $5,000. Other Adventists put money into the enterprise, and it was not long before the school had attracted to the neighborhood something of a colony of the members of that church. At the time the school was closed, March 1, 1895, it had some more than one hundred pupils enrolled. The cause of its closing was the arrest of the principal, Elder G. W. Colcord, one of the teachers, Prof. I. C. Colcord, and the manager of the boys' dormitory, M. C. Sturdevant. These men, together with ten other members of the church, had been indicted the previous November by the grand jury of Rhea county for violation of the Sunday law. Ten were arrested, three being away on business. The case of N. B. England was continued; the nine others arrested stood trial and were convicted. Mr. Sturdevant and Elder Colcord were convicted on four indictments each; Wm. Burchard and E. S. Abbott on two each, and the others on one each. The trials came off on March 5 and 6, and the men were committed to prison on March 8, for terms ranging from twenty to eighty days. There was one exception, Wm. Wolf, whose father, Dr. S. Wolf, secured his costs. All the defendants, including Mr. Wolf, refused to pay the costs, reasoning that to do so would be to admit the justice of the prosecutions, as well as to invite further persecution.

The chief defense in each instance was that the Bible lays upon us the duty of working six days each week and resting and worshiping on the other, the seventh, commonly called Saturday. They all denied that the secular work they did on Sunday was a nuisance, and they pleaded their constitutional right to work on that day. Article I. of the Bill of Rights of Tennessee says that "no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and that no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship." This guarantee of the organic law is an ample shield and would have been all that was necessary to protect the Adventists had the grand jury and the trial jury been composed of men who could reason or who loved liberty for anybody but themselves. The prisoners employed no counsel, but after the jury had brought in its verdict, three lawyers, including the ex-attorney-general of the district, asked permission to make a motion in arrest of judgment. This was done and the motion was ably argued by the volunteer attorneys. But the judge overruled the motion and imposed a fine of $2.50 in each case, which, with the costs, amounted to about $20 for each defendant. Judge Parks at once remitted the fines and expressed regret that he could not also remit the costs. His regrets seem to us to have been very much out of time. There should have been no difficulty in finding a way to so charge the jury as to secure a verdict of acquittal, even if advantage was not taken of the constitutional inhibition of just such miserable persecutions as this. As the defendants consistently refused to pay the costs they were committed to jail. The editor of the Dayton (Tenn.) Republican, who is not an Adventist, says that the informant in these cases is a dissolute coal miner. The grand jury has since brought in another batch of about twenty indictments against the Adventists, but hundreds of the employees of the Dayton Coal and Iron Company work in Dayton and Rhea county every Sunday and are not molested. The cowardly prosecutors of the Adventists evidently have a wholesome respect for the power of money.

Graysville Academy is closed, most of the students having gone to their homes in the various states. Some were almost ready for graduation, and upon these the closing of the school is especially severe. A number of students had to remain at Graysville on expense until they could get money from home to pay return fares. All but one of the imprisoned men have families depending upon them for support, and in several instances these families are large, one including five young children and another seven. All this outrage and suffering is inflicted upon these people because they chose to work on a certain day of the week instead of upon another day! Such damnable crimes as these against the Adventists of Tennessee are enough "to stir a fever in the blood of age and make an infant's sinews strong as steel." Well may the Review and Herald ask: "Is the American sense of justice dead?"

We cannot fail to honor the courage and consistency of these foully persecuted people. It is no matter if they do base their action upon Bible commands which are of no moment to us—that is their right; all we are concerned with is their demand for equal citizens' rights; that demand is absolutely valid and on its full satisfaction rests our own liberties. These men refuse to pay the fines assessed against them "because to do so would be to acknowledge that they are indebted to the state. They maintain that they have violated no proper law, that their punishment is unjust, and that taking their property to pay fines is nothing short of robbery. They do not resist the officers, but they will not become parties to the injustice by voluntarily paying fines; but as Elder Holmes, the Baptist, when commanded to remove his coat two hundred years ago that he might be whipped, said: 'I will not so much as unbutton a single button,' so the Adventists say, 'We will not pay a single penny. We will suffer imprisonment, if we must, and the loss of property if it is taken from us, but we have wronged no man, we have defrauded no man, and we will not voluntarily pay money for the free exercise of our God-given rights."

In his charge to the jury Judge Parks said that they must find for the state if it appeared that the defendants' work had been such as to disturb the worship of others or "to affect the morals of the community." As we have often before pointed out, the right to work is as indefeasible as the right to worship; it cannot be successfully maintained that honest industry should be made a crime or misdemeanor on any day in order that those who choose to worship on that day may be given a monopoly thereof. It is time that we quit "knoting" at the feet of ecclesiastics. Labor is as honorable as worship; the idea that he who labors on Sunday when the priest objects should be punished for his temerity is a child of the theological fiction that labor was imposed on man as a curse, in retaliation for his unlicensed pursuit of knowledge. If work on Sunday may be forbidden in the interest of religious exercises there is no reason why work may not be forbidden on saints' days and prayer-meeting evenings. In fact, it often happens that religious revivalists cajole or bully business men into closing their places during the services at the church on week days; on Sunday they compel them to close. Now the revivalists have the same right to worship on the other days of the week that they have on Sunday, and if the arguments of the Sabbatarian are sound they have the identical right to compel the cessation of work during their week-day worship that they have during their Sunday worship. More than this: It cannot be fairly denied that other forms of mental exercise are as much entitled to the protection of the law as is that form known as worship. If the Sunday statutes are valid and just, there is no reason why the scientific lecturer and the political speaker should not demand and obtain laws preventing any work during the days when they are addressing such of the people as choose to go to hear them. Of course we all know that this talk about "disturbance" is a mere pretext; the clergy are just as bitter against amusements in a building a mile from their churches as they are against the running of street cars by their doors, and they have often persecuted Adventists for working on their farms where there was not the slightest chance of disturbing the worship of anyone. As regards the men of whom we are speaking, there is no evidence, and there was none at the trial, that they had made any noise that disturbed the worship of their fellow-Christians.

How nauseating is this talk about Sunday labor affecting "the morals of the community"! The community has no morals; the individuals composing the community may be demoralized by certain actions, but what could be more preposterous than the assumption that the sight of men and women engaged in productive industry would deprave the morals of any person? This is "constructive immorality" with a vengeance! But probably we are a little too fast; on reflection, it may have to be admitted that Sunday labor and recreation are demoralizing to Sabbatarians. It is easily conceivable that the Rev. H. H. George is inspired with the desire to persecute when he sees a newsboy selling a paper on Sunday, and who shall deny that the Tennessee Protestants who are robbing the Adventists of their property and liberty were incited to the commission of that crime by the knowledge that their victims were "desecrating the Sabbath" by honest labor? It takes very little to make criminals of some people. Servetus demoralized Calvin in just this way, while there can be no doubt that the tortured victims of the Inquisition were responsible for the similar demoralization of the directors and familiars of the Holy Office. In this Tennessee view of the matter, what centers of moral contagion were Vanini, Bruno, and Galileo!

Since the last acknowledgment was made we have received for the Free Sunday Fund $5 from James Ladd, and for the Flecken Bible fight in Minnesota $1 from J. N. Coe, $1 from J. P. Whipple, and $2 from Chancey Avery. The Federation contributes $10 to the defense of Mr. Wise.

A Vicious Bill.

On March 26 Senator Mullins introduced in the Senate of this state one of the most sweeping bills ever presented in a legislative body. It is designed to regulate the theatrical managers, actresses, bill posters, printers, and publishers of New York. The drafters and backers of the bill proceed on the two assumptions that clothes alone make or preserve character, and that the people of this state have neither the sense, the self-respect, nor the courage to defy and punish the promoters of such legislation. The first assumption is false; the second is, we greatly fear, well-founded. Section 1 of the bill forbids the presentation anywhere in public of living pictures either in a nude or semi-nude state, or dressed in tights, or in "indecent attire." Any "female person" who so shows herself, even only to the extent of "portions of her body or limbs," may on conviction be imprisoned for not less than thirty days nor more than one year. This section, if adopted and enforced, would drive from the stage all plays requiring the ballet, all representations by living models of classical statuary and paintings which show any part of the human body in an unclothed state, and all dramas which call for the faithful delineation of life in periods when fashion and custom permitted all women or certain classes of women to appear with portions of the "body or limbs" as nature made them. Of course this section says that the exposure forbidden is to be of such a nature as to "suggest lewdness" or "offend decency," or which "tends to corrupt the morals of the young or of any other person who may see the same." "Suggest lewdness" to whom? Is there an act or a picture which will not suggest lewdness to someone? "Offend decency?" Whose sense of decency? That of the Turk, who thinks that the unveiled face of a "female person" is provocative of immorality? That of the Japanese, who sees nothing but purity in the ungarmented human figure? (Is the Turk purer than the Japanese?) Or is it the sense of decency of the fanatical fools who are leading in this crusade?—a crusade whose sole effect will be to still further degrade all that pertains to the relations of men and women. As George Du Maurier says, "nothing is so chaste as nudity"; and nothing is so unchaste as the imaginations of the male and female Comstocks. Think of the rank injustice of sending to prison an actress whose appearance on the stage has had, or rather may have, the effect of corrupting the "morals" of "any" person there present. It would be no more infamous to arrest Mrs. Burt or Mrs. Pritchard (who secured the introduction of this bill) when they walk along Broadway because it is feared that their persons or "portions" thereof will suggest something which may "tend" to "corrupt the morals" of "any" of the men who are watching them as they step over the muddy crossings.

The whole business is arrant nonsense and rank injustice. You can no more purify the stage by a censorship than you can the press. The Spanish military authorities want all editors who criticize the army to be tried by a court martial. Spain has been in this infernal suppressing business for six centuries, and where is she in civilization? The Spanish soldiers want their critics to be turned over to them for punishment. Our ministers of anti-naturalism want their rivals of the stage to be turned over to them for punishment. There is no more justice in the second demand than in the first. Leave the correction of the pulpit, of the press, and of the stage to the people in their individual capacity. All three greatly need improvement, but none of them will be purified by penal statutes. That the fittest may survive, there must be absolute liberty of choice.

Section 2 of Mrs. Burt's bill provides for the punishment of any person "who procures, employs, or permits any female person to do any of the acts prohibited in section 1." The first offense is a misdemeanor, with a penalty of not less than three months nor more than one year's imprisonment. Each subsequent offense is a felony, with a penalty of not less than two years nor more than five years' imprisonment in a state prison. In either case he may also be fined not less $100 nor more than $1,000. How mild and merciful are these Christian women?

Section 3 forbids the posting or other display anywhere of any representation of "any person or persons of either sex, real or imaginary, nude or partially nude, or in an indecent posture." This would make a misdemeanor of the display of a picture of Hercules or of the Apollo Belvedere, of Venus or of Diana the chaste. It would heavily fine or send to prison Sandow's manager if he should continue to advertise "the strong man" in the usual way. No matter how indecent the display at some of the theaters, the framers of this bill have surpassed those exhibits.

Here is Section 4 in full:

"The publisher, proprietor, editor, agent, manager, owner, vendor, pedler, or distributor of any newspaper, magazine, organ, pamphlet, book, periodical, advertisement, or device, printed, painted, or written, or otherwise produced, which shall contain, display, or exhibit lewd or indecent pictures of any person or persons of either sex, or of any person or persons, real or imaginary, of either sex, nude or partially nude, or in such postures, forms, or positions as shall excite, or be likely to excite, lewd or lascivious thoughts or ideas, or corrupt or tend to corrupt the morals of any person or persons, or is likely to lead to or induce lascivious or vulgar ideas, thoughts, or actions in or by any persons, young or old, is guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not less than $250 or imprisonment of not less than six months for the first offense, and, for any second or further conviction of such offense, by a fine of not less than $500 and imprisonment of not less than one year or more than two years."

This section, enacted and impartially enforced, would be a severe blow to art, for it would seriously interfere with the educational work of many first-class magazines and large numbers of papers, many of them of the better class. Hundreds of thousands of books now on sale would have to be expurgated or burned, including volumes of travel, collections of artistic masterpieces, and medical and obstetrical works. All these and very many more would come under the ban, for they contain pictures of men or women or of men and women wholly or partially nude. Large numbers of advertisers would be forced to prepare new designs; thousands of the most precious books in our public libraries would have to be mutilated or destroyed, and hereafter the representation of the beautiful human body would be a lost art. But is there no temptation to "sin" in the lovely "female" face? Why should not all women under one hundred years of age and all good-looking men be compelled to wear thick masks so as to avoid all possible danger of corrupting "the morals of any person or persons"? Of course all people are aware that there is never the least bit of "irregularity" in those countries where a woman shows her face to her husband only, and that immorality is known alone where the nude in art has obtained a foothold.

This attack upon the freedom of the press and of art is covert and dangerous. There are so many of our people who are incapable of reasoning sanely when the "moral" shibboleth is shouted in their ears. They have not learned to think for themselves on this subject, any more than the people of Europe had learned to think for themselves on the subject of religion during the ages when they permitted the priests to seduce them into torturing and murdering millions of their fellows on the pretext that the victims entertained heretical views that imperiled the safety of the state and the foundations of society. The sacerdotal descendants of those persecuting priests of the Dark Ages have discovered that it is no longer possible to greatly hinder the advance of thought and the social development of humanity by crying "blasphemy" and "sacrilege." The blasphemy statutes are of no further use to them; they have been forced to look sharply about for other means to prosecute their crusade in favor of ignorance. Religion has ceased to be the Great Taboo; now they must conjure with "rest" and "morality"; they must have Sunday laws and Comstock statutes. Once all our aspirations for truth were sacrificed on the altar of God; now we are commanded to lay our love of art and nature, our freedom of press and mails, on the altar of the Young Person. As God could not bear inquiry, so the Young Person is supposed to be unable to bear the sight of her mother or the knowledge of her own and her brother's physical nature. Cant and ignorance are the chief beatitudes and Comstock is king.

In 1878 Mr. Moncure D. Conway said: "No attack on free thought or free printing, open and aboveboard, could now be made without very serious and general resistance. This recent oppression has, if you will allow me the expression, sneaked back; it has subtly complicated itself with the moral feeling of the community; it has hid its horns under a white cowl of purity; it has masked itself as a defender of virtue and suppressor of vice. By so doing oppression of thought confesses that it cannot otherwise succeed even in seizing here and there an exceptional victim." This is as true now as it was then; it is in the Trojan Horse of "purity" that the enemy of liberty has stolen within our gates, and his success will be the death of real purity, the purity founded on knowledge and preserved by wisdom.

When men lose living faith in liberty, when they cease to believe that it has sovereign power to renew and redeem, to revivify and purify, they become drag-chains on the chariot wheels of progress, dead weights on the bowed shoulders of the toiling makers of civilization.

We wish our readers would look at the date on their wrappers and see if they do not owe us a renewal. If they find they do, it will be a great favor to us if they will forward it at their earliest convenience, as we need the money. Owing to various causes, more than the usual number are in arrears at present, and this embarrasses us financially, or we wouldn't mention it. We like to keep square with the world, and in order that we may do this it is necessary that our readers keep square with us, for when they let their subscriptions run behind we have to get behind with others. We have no capital to fall back upon, and depend upon getting our dues to give others their due. If our friends who are in arrears will note these facts and act thereupon, it will be, as we have said, a great favor to us, and a favor duly and thankfully appreciated.

The New York Herald thinks that the Irish American citizens of this country should be very much "gratified by the universal observance of St. Patrick's day as a legal holiday." We should suppose the sensible and justice-loving ones among them would be ashamed to create such a legal holiday. This is not the country for saints' days, for officially we can take no cognizance of saints. The Herald should know that the patron saint of Ireland could have been "honored by everyone who holds him in veneration and esteem" without making the seventeenth of March a legal holiday. As to that paper's notion that "aside from the religious aspects of saints' days it is not a bad idea that they should be observed as widely as possible," it needs to be said that we have enough holidays now and to spare. Idleness is not conducive to either mental, moral, or physical health. Those well-meaning people who would bring up the young without the discipline of work are, unwittingly, the foes of the race. But does the Herald mean to say that the "religious aspect" of saints' days is one to commend them to our favorable consideration? Does it not know enough about the genius of our institutions to realize that that aspect is the one all-sufficient and insurmountable objection to their observance by virtue of state sanction?

The enemies of the civil republic are "getting together" in fine shape. Hon. Elijah A. Morse, of Massachusetts, is, as all know, the most active friend in the lower house of Congress of the God-in-the-Constitution amendment, he having introduced the joint resolution providing for that amendment and lobbied for it before the Judiciary Committee. He is also, as a matter of course, a warm champion of all the national Sunday laws proposed, as he was one of the leading Congressional advocates of the Sunday closing of the World's Fair. He can always be depended upon to do all that within him lies to secure the political ascendancy of the church. He is now an aspirant for the governorship of Massachusetts, and to further his ambition in that direction he presided on the evening of March 28 at a mass meeting under the auspices of the American Protective Association in the People's church, Boston. The Association's support of Henry W. Blair in New Hampshire and of Elijah A. Morse in Massachusetts is sinister enough to preclude the necessity of comment or of warning.

While it is not cheering to hear that bills for the taxation of church property are defeated, it is encouraging to know that such measures are proposed, for it indicates that the subject is up for discussion, and that is the first stage in the march to justice. In the Connecticut House the bill, unfavorably reported upon by the committee, to tax church property over $15,000 in value, was rejected. In the Colorado Senate the House bill taxing church property of over $2,500 in value was laid on the table, from which it cannot be taken except by a two-thirds vote. The only record vote taken was on an amendment to the motion to adopt the report of the finance committee indefinitely postponing the bill, to refer the bill to the committee of the whole. There were nine ayes and sixteen nays, the friends of the bill voting aye. In the Utah Constitutional Convention there were found to be many friends of equal taxation, but there were not enough to incorporate the principle in the Bill of Rights. We have not learned the result in Wisconsin and other states where bills for the taxation of ecclesiastical property have been pending. But whether we meet defeat or achieve victory the struggles in legislative bodies this season are but skirmishes in the conflict that is extending and intensifying year by year, and that will not cease until church and state are wholly separated or the backward-sweeping waves of theocracy overwhelm the republic in ruin.

At the recent National Reform convention in Boston, Rev. J. M. Foster delivered an address in which he answered the question, "Shall the Government of this Nation Acknowledge Christ the King?" Pleading for the proposed Christian amendment, he said:

"The Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and 'as any law that contravenes the law of God is no law at all,' it should fully acknowledge the absolute supremacy of the divine law. But our Constitution does not do this. It is silent as the grave respecting the crown rights and royal prerogatives of the Lord Jesus Christ."

It does not appear to have occurred to Mr. Foster that it is incumbent upon him and his associates to show what the law of God is before we can be politically damned for not recognizing it in the Constitution. As to the "crown rights and royal prerogatives" of his heavenly lord, we submit that lords are away down in the scale below the sovereign and the dukes and earls. Leaving the last two classes out of the discussion, we must remind Mr. Foster that all lords are subordinate to the sovereign, and that as the people are sovereign in this country, his foreign lord will have to be naturalized before he can become a fraction of the American supreme power. The Boston clergyman thinks altogether too much of "crown rights and royal prerogatives" to be a safe citizen of the republic. Such a man is always "fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils."

The New Orleans Times-Democrat has recently had two editorials which deserve the thanks of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps, which are in order to send this week. One of the articles is more than a column in length and has reference to the refusal of one of the Board of Police Commissioners of New Orleans to vote for a certain man to fill a vacancy on the Board because he thought the candidate was a Jew. It turned out that the candidate, Mr. Brunswick, is not of that people, but this did not make the intolerance of the Commissioner any the less offensive to the Times-Democrat, which tells him that cosmopolitanism is one of the marks, as it is a result, of superior culture. The other editorial deals with the Sabbath crusade in St. Louis. It remarks that the Municipal Reform Association of that city "has started and is vigorously pushing a campaign worthy of the Middle Ages." It adds:

"One of the chief propositions is to shut down street railway traffic on Sunday as opposed to Christianity. A warrant has been served on the leading street railway lines with that object in view. After a few days' trial of this so-called reform, so foreign to the spirit of the age, St. Louis will probably become disgusted with the reform movement altogether, and welcome back the reign of iniquity which allowed its people to get a little fresh air and to go to church or pay a visit, without tramping several miles. It is in this way that reform movements make themselves ridiculous and obnoxious and defeat themselves."

Thank the editor for his defense of good sense, but point out that the "reform" was initially the very opposite of reform, being essentially reactionary and absurd.

A contemporary remarks that "a recruit to the ranks of Freethought is seldom or never won from the ranks of Catholicism." We suppose that this must be so, although, if we are to accept it as gospel, it will puzzle us to account for the Freethinkers in Spain, Italy, Portugal, and the South American states, and for most of those in France. Voltaire, born a Catholic and educated by Jesuits, did more for the freedom of the human mind than several thousand Protestants. We are also informed that the Catholic dares not put any construction on his Bible. But it so happens that the monk Luther and his fellow rebels did, and thus we, the Freethinkers of to-day, are the intellectual descendants of the Catholic, only two steps removed. The fact is, the Catholic is told that he must not use his reason, and so it remains in a quiescent condition, but often, when he has discovered that he can use it, it conducts him out from the prison-house of superstition at a bound. The Protestant, on the contrary, has been taught that he may reason, but will go to hell if he reasons to a wrong conclusion, and so his mind is perverted and he finds it extremely difficult to reason clearly, even after he gets out into the pastures of Freethought, as he imagines. Above all other men the Freethinker should be free enough from prejudice to seek for and tell the truth about all religions and their disciples. Among the ex-Catholics whose names we weave with chaplets were the martyrs Bruno and Vanini, both of whom were monks; Campanella, Condorcet (friend of Paine); Diderot (educated by the Jesuits); Gambetta (whose uncle was a priest, whose father wished him to become one, and who was educated in a clerical seminary), and Voltaire. These are a few of the many recruits to the ranks of Freethought from the ranks of Catholicism.

So Much Smoke, So Little Fire!

We commented last week on one of the common "fake" stories about a "blasphemer's" house being struck by lightning as a "judgment" while he was criticising the Christian fetic, the Bible. The story had it that several of the wicked man's family were stunned, and that the preachers were counting on the "conversion" of the Infidel as one of the fruits of the "warning." That is, this was the lie as told by the United Press; the Associated Press agent was not quite so fertile in invention; the main features of his sensational yarn we gave in our editorial note last week. Behold how plain a tale puts these falsifiers down! Mr. Crawford lives in Buena Vista, Ga., and the following account of the "visitation" is from the Marion County Patriot of that place:

RESIDENCE STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.

Wednesday morning about 9:30 o'clock lightning struck the residence of Mr. C. S. Crawford, and the family narrowly escaped injury.

The bolt entered the northwest corner room, which is the parlor, and badly shattered that side of the building. A fine piano was greatly injured by splitting its bottom and breaking the castors from under the legs. The mechanism of the piano may have been injured, though we did not learn.

Fortunately none of the family were in that room and none of them injured. Mrs. Crawford was sitting at the sewing-machine in another room, and while she was greatly shocked she was not injured. The children, including Helen Jackson, were in the garden and were greatly frightened. It was fortunate that the bolt was partly diverted to the wire fence, else the building might have fared worse. The bolt traversed the wire fence and demolished the gate posts, which were of wood. A little negro girl at the well was pretty badly injured by the bolt which traversed the fence, came around to the well and melted the chain. We are glad that there was no more serious result.

Will the secular and religious circulators of the canard now tell their readers the truth about it?

Delegates sent by a church society to Northumberland refused to deliver addresses illustrated with lantern slides, on the ground that "Paul and Barnabas never carried magic lanterns about with them." Neither did they ride on railway trains or announce their coming by telegraph or use printed gospels or distribute tracts by parcels post. Why cannot such worshipers of the past be consistent—or else make up their minds to live in this age?

The Two Cosmogonies of Genesis.

Science agrees with the account of creation given in Genesis.

The above is the stereotyped claim of orthodox theologians. But this claim is too vague. To entitle it to a candid consideration, to furnish an intelligible basis upon which to establish it and determine its merits, they should tell us which account. In the first two chapters of Genesis are given two cosmogonies, written by two different authors. Neither of them agrees with the demonstrated truths of science. Above all, they do not agree with each other. The points of disagreement are many, chief of which are the following:

1. In the first account the appellation of deity is uniformly "Elohim" (the gods), translated "God." This term occurs thirty-five times.

In the second account the appellation of deity is uniformly "Jehovah (Yahweh) Elohim," translated "Lord God." This term occurs eleven times.

The first is called the Elohist, the second the Jehovistic, account of creation. They represent two different schools of Jewish thought, if not two different periods of Jewish history.

2. In the first, with a single exception, that portion of the universe outside the earth is called "the heaven." "God created the heaven;" "the waters under the heaven;" "the firmament of the heaven," etc.

In the second, that portion of the universe outside the earth is called "the heavens." "The generation of the heavens;" "the earth and the heavens."

3. In the first, earth is a chaos covered with water. The waters must be assuaged before vegetation can appear.

In the second, earth is at first a dry plain. Vegetation cannot exist because there is no moisture. "For the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth" (ii, 5).

4. In the first, plants are created from the earth—are a product of the earth. "And the earth brought forth grass and herb" (i, 12).

In the second, they are a creation independent of the earth—are created by God and then transferred to earth. "The Lord God made the earth and the heavens, and every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew" (ii, 4, 5).

Corbin's "Bible Commentator," an orthodox authority, referring to this passage, says: "God not only made the earth and the heavens, but every plant of the field before [the italics are his] it was in the earth."

5. In the first, fowls, fish, and aquatic animals form one act of creation—land animals and reptiles another; the former being created on the fifth day, the latter on the sixth (i, 21-25).

In the second, fowls and land animals are created at the same time—form one creative act (ii, 19).

6. In the first, fowls are created out of the water. "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth" (i, 20).

In the second, fowls are created out of the ground. "Out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air" (ii, 19).

7. In the first, trees are created before man. Trees appear on the third day, while man is not created until the sixth day (i, 12, 27).

In the second, trees are created after man. "And the Lord God formed man; . . . planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree," etc. (ii, 7, 8).

8. In the first, fowls are created before man—are created on the fifth day, while the creation of man does not occur until the sixth day.

In the second, fowls are created after man. "The Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them" (ii, 19).

9. In the first, man is created after the beasts. God's first work on the sixth day was the creation of beasts, his last work was the creation of man (i, 24-31).

In the second, man is created before the beasts. God makes man before he plants the garden of Eden, while beasts are not made until after the garden is planted (ii, 7-19).

10. In the first, man and woman are created at the same time. "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them" (i, 27).

In the second, woman is created after man. The writer supposes a considerable period of time to have elapsed between the creation of man and the creation of woman. God makes man; then he plants a garden and places man in the garden to tend it; next he makes the animals and the birds and brings them to Adam to name; finally he concludes that Adam needs a helpmeet, and taking a rib from his body, creates woman.

11. In the first, man is created in the image of God. "God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him."

In the second, it is not intimated that man was created in God's image. It is only after Adam and Eve have partaken of the tree of knowledge that God, in the third chapter, is led to say: "The man is become as one of us."

12. In the first, man, at the creation, is given both fruit and herbs to subsist upon. "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, . . . and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat" (i, 29).

In the second, he is given fruit alone for food. Not until after he sins and the curse is pronounced does God say: "Thou shalt eat the herb of the field" (iii, 18). According to this writer, the use of herbs and grain for food was a consequence of man's fall.

13. In the first, man may partake of the fruit of all the trees. "Every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat."

In the second, he is not permitted to partake of the fruit of all the trees. "Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it" (ii, 17).

14. In the first, man is given dominion over all the earth. "Let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth" (i, 26).

In the second, his sovereignty is confined to a garden. "And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it" (ii, 15).

15. In the first, the heavens and the earth are created in six literal days.

In the second, no mention is made of this six days' creation. On the contrary, the writer simply refers to "the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens" (ii, 4).

16. Both cosmogonies are theological rather than scientific. The real purpose of the first, in its present form at least, is not so much to explain the creation of the universe as to inculcate a belief in the divine institution of the Sabbath. (The first three verses of the second chapter belong to this account.)

The second contains no recognition of the Sabbath. The chief purpose of this account, if we include the third chapter, which is really a part of it, is to establish the doctrine of the fall of man.

17. In the first, we have a purely anthropomorphic conception of deity. The writer states that man was created in the image of God. Hence God must exist in the form of man.

In the second, this anthropomorphic conception of God is wanting—at least is not directly expressed.

18. The writer of the first evidently believes that Elohim comprises two beings, or two classes of beings—male and female.

The writer of the second evidently considers deity a two-sexed being. He accepts monotheism, but his Jehovah is a God uniting in one body both sexes.

19. In the first, God, from his throne in heaven, speaks earth's creations into being. "God said, Let the earth bring forth, . . . and it was so."

In the second, God comes down on earth, plants a garden, molds man out of clay, breathes in his nostrils, makes woman out of a rib, makes birds and animals as a boy makes mud-pies, and brings them to Adam to see what he will call them.

20. The first presents a lofty conception of creation. It is not in accord with science, but judged merely as a literary composition—a poetic product of the imagination—it possesses real merit.

The second is destitute of both scientific and literary merit—it is crude and childish.

To establish the divine origin of Genesis it is incumbent upon Bibliolaters not merely to harmonize its theories with science, but to reconcile also its theories with each other. The latter is as impossible as the former. Dean Stanley, in his memorial sermon on Sir Charles Lyell at Westminster Abbey, made this frank admission:

"It is now clear to diligent students of the Bible that the first and second chapters of Genesis contain two narratives of the creation, side by side, differing from each other in most every particular of time and place and order." J. E. REMSBURG.

More "Truth About the Tariff."

According to Mr. A. F. Hamilton, the truth about the tariff, briefly told, is: "Protection is robbery;" "a high tariff is high handed spoliation;" "based on dogmas;" "all who study its arguments become freetraders," except "a swinish multitude who shirk the burden of proof," etc.; "the enormous burden falls on the poor and the rich escape;" and "it taxes us in proportion to the necessities of life we consume."

Now, the central truth about a protective tariff is that it taxes imported goods expressly to induce our people to prefer untaxed home products, thus keeping all possible money at home and providing every possible facility for American labor.

No freetrader has ever answered this argument or ever will.

A tariff would not be protective if it taxed home necessities instead of imported luxuries.

Freetraders must be hard pressed for arguments to palm off such misrepresentations for "the truth about the tariff."

Let us have a little sense. Does the poor man indulge in a $500 "genuine Russian fur overcoat;" wrap his wife in a $1,000 "Paris de mode," draped with $500 of "Belgian lace," and glittering $10,000 worth of diamonds; regale his friends with $7 "Rhine wines;" cover his floors with costly "Persian rugs," and his walls with the "masterpieces of art?" For these things pay enormous duties.

Pshaw! Mr. Hamilton knows better; knows that the poor man wraps himself and wife in Louisiana cotton and Colorado or Vermont wool, eats Minneapolis flour, Texas beef, and California fruits, and carpets his floor with "American ingrain," and his house is made of Michigan pine, put together with Pittsburgh nails. And he knows that none of these things pays any tariff tax.

Indeed, we can live like fighting-cocks and not pay a dollar to the "robber tariff."

I suspect that fifty cents a year will more than cover my entire tariff contribution, or that of Mr. Hamilton, or Geo. E. Macdonald. A magnificent "spoliation" for an American citizen to howl about!

The government revenue—$480,000,000—averages $34 per family. Now, Mr. Freetrader, have you thought of any scheme by which you can let yourself down easier than fifty cents per year for your share? And if so, are you dead sure that "the other fellows" will not denounce your lovely scheme as "high-handed robbery?"

Do you argue that you pay higher prices for everything under high tariff? I deny it. You pay the same prices for every commodity whose surplus we export. Otherwise we could not export. Careful statistics prove that over nine-tenths of the wholesale price of all the staple articles of American factories is the cost of the labor entering into their production. And of agricultural products, about all the wholesale price is labor. Your outcry is therefore nineteen-twentieths against the laborer. And this is your boasted sympathy for the poor.

Do you say, "Protection fosters monopoly and creates millionaires?" I deny it, and demand the proof. They prosper when everybody else prospers, and that is all the tariff has to do with them. The remedy lies in another direction. To depress general business till you squeeze the money out of the rich means that you will crush the poor outright.

Is it class legislation to tax imports and exempt home products? No, unless the exemption of the poor man's home from execution is class legislation—unless a graded income tax is class legislation.

It is simply a fine for preferring foreign labor to home labor; and if such a fine is class legislation, let us have plenty of such class legislation.

For thirty years we had high tariff and good times. For two years we have monkeyed with the buzz-saw of free trade. We have not embraced the buzz-saw—only gone a step nearer it—got a low tariff and many free items. The result is business prostration; money running off to Europe, and government borrowing it back at the rate of two hundred millions a year; and, worst of all, a million men out of work, bidding against all other workers. I challenge the freetrader to name a more gigantic tariff robbery than this wholesale confiscation of a million entire incomes.

This country has never dared to inaugurate actual free trade. And I trust it never will till the conditions of labor are more equitably leveled up over the world. There is not a free-trade nation on earth to-day. Every nation protects its special industries. If we should adopt free trade in America, we would present the absurd spectacle of a people paying tribute to every nation on earth except our own. And this is your boasted free trade statesmanship. For shame! We have no great free trade party in America. Both Democrats and Republicans adopt some sort of protective tariff; and these two great parties comprise nine-tenths of the voters and nineteen-twentieths of the statesmen of this country. And you call them "a swinish multitude." I may be a "swine" or a "multitude," but let me remind your highness that the great mass of American citizens have an honest heart; that they know their own interest quite as well as the average free trader; that it is quite possible for even a free trader to be mistaken; and, finally, that denouncing opponents as "swine" or "robbers," is not argument, but the cheapest kind of demagogism.

The "Bankruptcy" of Science.

An approved organ of the Roman church, the Catholic Review, published in New York city, makes the following announcement with unconcealed joy:

Science is bankrupt. That is the decision of M. Ferdinand Brunetiere, scientist, professor at the Sorbonne, Freethinker and member of the French Academy. In a recent issue of the Revue des Deux Mondes, he says that science has failed to solve the question of man's origin and destiny, it has been unable to make a clear statement of its own case and claims, and it has not supplanted religion, it has not provided "the missing link" needed to sustain its unscriptural theory of the descent of man, it has not cleared away the miraculous, it has not taken away from Christianity its vitality and its power of propagation. It has failed to keep its promises, to furnish proofs, to maintain its pretensions. Religion is recovering its old time prestige and re-conquering the ground from which it was temporarily driven. Science is bankrupt. This is the judgment of a scientist without religion. It agrees with the opinion of the marquis of Salisbury, president of the British Scientific Association. Atheistic science is bankrupt!

In his recent work on "Degeneration" the German scholar, Prof. Max Nordau, has a chapter on "Mysticism," in which, under the subhead of "Symbolism," the assertion of the French "scientists" that science is bankrupt is considered at some length. If his remarks had been made with special reference to the foregoing jubilant note of the Roman Catholic organ, they could not have answered it more effectively. Professor Nordau, after quoting Edouard Rod, Charles Morice, M. F. Paulhan, and other neo-Catholics who maintain that science has failed to "keep its promises" and that it is "powerless to satisfy the needs of mankind," proceeds as follows:

Overwhelming as may appear this unanimity between strong minds commanding respect and weak graphomaniacs [scribbling fools], it does not, nevertheless, contain the slightest spark of truth. To assert that the world turns away from science because the "empirical," which means the scientific, method of observation and registration has suffered shipwreck, is either a conscious lie or shows lack of mental responsibility. A healthy-minded man must almost feel ashamed to have still to demonstrate this.

In the last ten years, by means of spectrum analysis, science has made disclosures in the constitution of the most distant heavenly bodies, their component matter, their degree of heat, the speed and direction of their motions; it has firmly established the essential unity of all modes of force, and has made highly probable the unity of all matter; it is on the track of the formation and development of chemical elements, and it has learned to understand the building up of extremely intricate organic combinations; it shows us the relations of atoms in molecules, and the position of molecules in space; it has thrown wonderful light on the conditions of the action of electricity, and placed this force at the service of mankind; it has renewed geology and paleontology, and disentangled the concatenation of animal and vegetable forms of life; it has newly created biology and embryology, and has explained in a surprising manner, through the discovery and investigation of germs, some of the most disquieting mysteries of perpetual metamorphosis, illness, and death; it has found or perfected methods which, like chronography, instantaneous photography, etc., permit of the analysis and registration of the most fleeting phenomena, not immediately apprehensible by human sense, and which promise to become extremely fruitful for the knowledge of nature. And in the face of such splendid, such overwhelmingly grand results, the enumeration of which could easily be doubled and trebled, does anyone dare to speak of the shipwreck of science, and of the incapacity of the empirical method?

Science is said not to have kept what she promised. When has she ever promised anything else than honest and attentive observation of phenomena and, if possible, establishment of the conditions under which they occur? And has she not kept this promise? Does she not keep it perpetually? If anyone has expected of her that she would explain from one day to another the whole mechanism of the universe, as a juggler explains his apparent magic, he has indeed no idea of the true mission of science. She denies herself all leaps and flights. She advances step by step. She builds slowly and patiently a firm bridge out into the unknown, and can throw no new arch over the abyss before she has sunk deep the foundations of a new pier in the depths, and raised it to the right height.

Meanwhile she asks nothing at all about the first cause of phenomena, so long as she has so many proximate causes to investigate. Many of the most eminent men of science go so far as to assert that the first cause will never become the object of scientific investigation, and call it, with Herbert Spencer, "the Unknowable," or exclaim despondingly, with Du Bois-Reymond, Ignorabimus. Both of them in this respect are completely unscientific, and only prove that even clear thinkers like Herbert Spencer, and sober investigators like Du Bois-Reymond, stand yet under the influence of the theological dreams. Science can speak of no unknowable, since this would presuppose that she is able to mark exactly the boundaries of the knowable. This, however, she cannot do, since every new discovery thrusts back that boundary. Moreover, the acceptance of an Unknowable involves the acknowledgment that there is something which we cannot know. Now, in order to be able seriously to assert the existence of this Something, either we must have acquired some knowledge of it, however slight and indistinct, and this, therefore, would prove that it cannot be unknowable, since we actually know it, and nothing then would justify us in declaring beforehand that our present knowledge of it, however little it may be, will not be extended and deepened; or else we have no knowledge, even of the minutest character, of the philosopher's Unknowable, in which case it cannot exist for us. The whole conception is based upon nothing, and the word is an idle creation of a dreaming imagination. The same thing can be said of Ignorabimus. It is the opposite of science. It is not a correct inference from well-grounded premises, it is not the result of observation, but a mystical prophecy. No one has the right to make communications with respect to the future as matters of fact. Science can announce what she knows to-day; she can also mark off exactly what she does not know; but to say what she will or will not at any time know is not her office.

It is true that whoever asks from Science that she shall give an answer to all the questions of idle and restless minds with unshaken and audacious certainty must be disappointed by her, for she will not and cannot fulfil his desire. Theology and metaphysics have an easier task. They devise some fable, and propound it with overwhelming earnestness. If anyone does not believe in them they threaten and insult the intractable client; but they can prove nothing to him; they cannot force him to take their chimeras for cash. Theology and metaphysics can never be brought into a dilemma. It costs them nothing to add to their words more words, to unite to one voluntary assertion another, and to pile up dogma upon dogma. It will never occur to the serious sound mind, which thirsts after real knowledge, to seek it from metaphysics or theology. They appeal only to childish brains, whose desire for knowledge, or, rather, whose curiosity, is fully satisfied with the cradling croon of an old wife's tale.

Science does not compete with theology and metaphysics. If the latter declare themselves able to explain the whole phenomenon of the universe, Science shows that those pretended explanations are empty chatter. She, for her part, is naturally on her guard against putting in the place of a proved absurdity another absurdity. She says modestly, "Here we have a fact, here an assumption, here a conjecture. 'Tis a rogue who gives more than he has." If this does not satisfy the neo-Catholics, they should sit down and themselves investigate, themselves find out new facts, and help to make clear the weird obscurity of the phenomenon of the universe. That would be a proof of a true desire for knowledge. At the table of science there is room for all, and every fellow-observer is welcome. But this does not enter into even the dreams of these poor creatures who dabble about the "bankruptcy of science."

True, science tells us nothing about the life after death—of harp-concerts in paradise, and of the transformation of stupid youths and hysterical geese into white-clad angels with rainbow-colored wings. It contents itself, in a much more plain and prosaic manner, with alleviating the existence of mankind on earth. It lessens the average of mortality, and lengthens the life of the individual through the suppression of known causes of disease; it invents new comforts, and makes easier the struggle against nature's destructive powers. The Symbolist who is preserved after surgical interference through asepsy from suppuration, mortification, and death; who protects himself by a Chamberland filter from typhus; who by the careless turning of a button fills his room with electric light; who through a telephone can converse with someone beloved in a far distant country, has to thank this alleged bankrupt science for it all, and not the theology to which he maintains that he wants to return.

The dunces who abuse science reproach it also with having destroyed ideals and stolen from life all its worth. This accusation is just as absurd as the talk about the bankruptcy of science. A higher ideal than the increase of general knowledge there cannot be. What saintly legend is as beautiful as the life of an inquirer who spends his existence bending over a microscope, almost without bodily wants, known and honored by few, working only for his own conscience's sake, without any other ambition than that perhaps one little new fact may be firmly established, which a more fortunate successor will make use of in a brilliant synthesis, and insert as a stone in some monument of natural science? What religious fable has inspired with a contempt of death sublimer martyrs than a Gehlen, who sank down poisoned while preparing the arsenious hydrogen which he had discovered; or a Crocé-Spinelli, who was overtaken by death in an over-rapid ascent of his balloon while observing the pressure of the atmosphere; or an Ehrenberg, who became blind over his life's work; or a Hyrtl, who almost entirely destroyed his eyesight by his anatomical corrosive preparations; or the doctors who inoculate themselves with some deadly disease—not to speak of the innumerable crowd of discoverers traveling to the North Pole and to the interior of dark continents? And did Archimedes really feel his life to be so worthless when he entreated the pillaging bands of Marcellus, "Do not disturb my circles"? Genuin healthy poetry has always recognized this, and finds its most ideal characters, not in a devotee who murmurs prayers with drizzling lips and stares with distended eyes at some visual hallucination, but in a Prometheus and a Faust, who wrestle for science, i.e., for exact knowledge of nature.

The assertion that science has not kept its promises, and that therefore the rising generation is turning away from it, does not for a moment resist criticism, and is entirely without foundation. . . . The Jesuits invented the phrase, "bankruptcy of science," and their pupils repeat it after them, because it includes a plausible explanation of their pietistic mooning, the real organic causes of which are unknown to them, and for that matter would not be understood if they were known. "I return to faith because science does not satisfy me" is a possible statement. It is even a superior thing to say, since it presupposes a thirst for truth and a noble interest in great questions. On the contrary, a man will hardly be willing to confess, "I am an enthusiastic admirer of the Trinity and the Holy Virgin because I am degenerate and my brain is incapable of clear thought."

One God or Several.

Having read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 23d an article, "The First Honest Translation of Genesis," I was surprised to see that the writer tries to deprive the Bible writers of the only credit they may be said to deserve, namely, that of giving us only one God of their making, and sparing us the burden of too many. On the strength of the passages quoted we may safely and justly accuse them of error and ignorance, but never of "polytheism." The word "Elohim" may be translated, in the plural, gods, when written alone; but here, in these passages, whenever "Elohim" appears, it is preceded or followed by the third person singular. I will give the Hebrew text of the first verses of Genesis:

1. Bereshith Boro Elohim
1. In the beginning he created God, etc.
2. V. Ruah Elohim Mrahefeth
2. And the spirit God she moves, etc.
3. Va Yomer Elohim Yehe Or
3. And he said God there shall be light, etc.
4. Va Yar Elohim Eth ho-Or
4. And he saw God the light, etc.

Now, the plural of Boro is Borou—they created. The plural of Ruah is Ruhos—spirits. The plural of Va Yomer is Va Yomru—they have said. And the plural of Va Yar is Va Yiru. In only one place does it seem that God speaks of more than himself—where it reads, "Let us make man in our image"—and this is nothing. Rulers of old and of to-day affect the same style when speaking of themselves. In the very next verse the writer of Genesis says, "So God made man in his own image, in the image of God created he him." Can any mistake be made in reading the Hebrew text? Has not God said, done, worked, and seen all alone until, tired out (and no wonder), he took a rest all alone?

I have made a thorough study of the Hebrew Bible, and I am satisfied that the writers of that book are not guilty of any conception of polytheism. The word "Elohim" in a few instances does not signify God, for it also means power and strength. This removes the last shadow of suspicion from those parts of the Bible in which there may be a suggestion of polytheism.

But supposing that the Bible is what the writer maintains that it is, will that alter the character of the book? Will it become better, more intelligible, more truthful, more instructive, more scientific? Or will it become worse? Can it be more contradictory, or more cruel to man and beast? Could it possibly exhibit more ignorance and superstition? Are a multitude of gods less to blame for inhuman teachings than one god? We want no more gods; we have had enough of them. Let us have more and stronger light to penetrate the deep crevasses of that darkest book, where hate, revenge, and fanaticism are entrenched. Let us have more men who, for the sake of justice and liberty, will dare to tell the truth.

MORA NEBUCHERIN.

Observations.

The question now before the house is, Were one or more gods concerned in the job of creating described in the first chapter of that novel without a purpose called "The Holy Bible?" and we may as well make it a symposium. The argument, then, founded on the number of Hebrew nouns and verbs does not impress me as a very convincing one, for the reason that both singular and plural are said to occur in references to the architect of the universe. Of course the gender of the Elohim cannot be expected to throw any light upon the discussed question; otherwise it would be in order to direct attention to the word translated "she moves," which indicates that there was a woman in the case? But putting these inconsequential matters aside, the fact remains that Eloah spoke, and the thing to be found out is, to whom did he address his remarks? If he was the only man on the job, to whom did he issue orders and make suggestions about the proper build for a man? Those questions, if I am anything of a biblicist, take precedence over all considerations of grammar, or even of sex, which latter the editors of the Woman's Bible think is quite weighty. It has been pointed out by so eminent a scholar as Huxley that the Bible deities appear under two names, Elohim and Yahveh or Jehovah, the latter being a lord god, and the suggestion follows that the Elohim were inferior characters who acted as Jehovah's fuglemen. In some places they were called sons of God. They attended the council described in the first chapter of the book of Job, when Satan, their brother, came also. They made pastoral calls on the women folks, with the usual results, and exercised a general superintendence over Jehovah's outside business. They turned up in various places under different names, but I suspect that they were always the same sad Elohim. An old lady who had passed her ninetieth milestone saw one, who assured her that she should not die childless, and "it was so." A brace of them were guests of Lot, one wrestled all night with the visionary, Jacob, and they ate matzos with others of the patriarchs. No two Bible writers describe them alike, but the diversity of those literary persons is shown in their disagreement about every subject that any two of them happen to touch. Justin Martyr, a church father who flourished his pen in the second century of this era of grace, called the Elohim angels, and states that their too susceptible natures caused them to trespass with the frail daughters of men, and hence sprang a race of demons. We have seen that Satan was among the "sons of God" who came together near Uz to discuss the incorrigible piety of Job, and despite the absence of Mr. Gladstone's literal homogeneity, we have no reason to doubt that he was the identical Satan that offered the juice of the forbidden fruit to Eve. He must then have been either a spectator of the creation or an assistant, and as nothing is said about his creation it is impossible to reach any other conclusion than that he was one of the angels or Elohim. He may have been among the spirits of God described as moving upon the face of the waters.

With these facts before us, with the earth and sky populated and increased in population by the sons of God, it is a waste of time to discuss the grammatical inflections of those alphabetical topsyturries called the written Hebrew tongue. Our friend of the biblical name, who gives the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER some translated sentences from Genesis, says that he has made a thorough study of the Hebrew Bible. There is no reason for doubting that he has, but how does that help him? Suppose the Bible had been written in English, and we were called upon to decide the meaning of the following narrative:

Sodhlice tha se Hælend of tham munte nydher astah, tha fyligdon him mycle manio. Tha geneasæhte hreofoa to him and hine to him ge-eaðmedde, and thus cwadh: Drihten, gyf thu wilt, thu miht me geælensian. Tha astrehte se Hælend hys hand and hrepode hysne, and thus cwadh: Ic wylle, beo geælensod. And hys hreofoa was hradlice geælensod.

This is English, or Anglo-Saxon, a good many years younger than the Hebrew in which the story of Genesis must have been written, but there are a whole lot of clergymen who have made a thorough study of the English Bible, who could not tell whether the nouns and verbs are in the singular number or the plural. Some might not even recognize the excerpt as a part of the eighth chapter of the gospel according to St. Matthew. No reader of the Hebrew Bible of to-day can imagine that he is reading it in the Hebrew as it was written. The Genesis story, in some tongue or other, may be given a date two hundred years before Christ, and there is no Hebrew manuscript of it earlier than A.D. 900. Supposing the creation is placed six thousand years ago, according to biblical time-keeping, then the first authentic account of the affair, in Hebrew, that we can lay our hands on was written some five thousand years after the occurrence. In the centuries intervening between the time when the creation story was first recorded and the time when our oldest manuscripts were written there was opportunity for the language to change several times. Look at the sample of English I have quoted, which is only a few hundred years old, and then guess how much of the first manuscript of Genesis a modern Hebrew student would be able to decipher, digest, and assimilate. If he could tell the nouns from the verbs or the verbs from a moccasin track, he would deserve a medal whether he got the number and gender right or wrong. We can arrive at the meaning of old English by tracing its changes, but the Hebrew offers no such opportunity. Furthermore, there is reason to doubt the existence of an original Hebrew manuscript to get back to, the oldest being in Greek. Recurring to the matter of a plurality of gods, it is evident from the first commandment, "Thou shalt have none other gods before me," that the writer believed there was more than one, otherwise the command would be a waste of words. There appears to have been a rivalry among the manufacturers of gods then, as there is now between the proprietors of different brands of soap, baking powders, typewriters, and bicycles. The "monotheism" of the Jewish leaders, therefore, consisted in an attempt to have their god accepted in place of others, but they were never wholly successful, for their followers were continually falling away from Jehovah and running after strange deities. The permanence of polytheism was shown when the Christian world set up its Trinity, with the Virgin Mary a fourth person. The only real monotheists are the Deists, whose god has no family connections.

The name of the Rev. H. B. Spayd, whose initials suggest that he is an indicative perfect member of the third sex, is attached to a set of resolutions addressed to the legislature of Pennsylvania in opposition to a proposed modification of the Sunday laws which will permit the sale of newspapers on the Christian Sabbath. If the legislature, when resolutions come up, decide to pass Spayd's, it is inferred that clubs will continue to be trumps in Pennsylvania.

Mr. S. F. Benson, of Iowa, has estimated my "entire tariff contribution" at less than fifty cents. It is worth something to have an upholder of that political dogma, protection, admit that an American citizen does contribute, though sparingly, to the support of the system. Probably fifty cents would pay Mr. Benson's share of taxes to balance church exemption, but the insignificance of the sum will not, I hope, deter him from denouncing the favoritism. May he stand firm for justice, equality, and liberty, even though some favor of exemption should remark that four-bits a year is a hell of a thing for a citizen of Iowa to be kicking about.

Mr. Benson gives the government revenue as $480,000,000, or $34 annually per family, and says that the American citizen is let off with the payment of fifty cents of that amount. Does Mr. Benson request us to believe that the rest is paid by the foreigner? I ask merely for information and to learn how the foreigner is reimbursed. The theory, as thus far developed, is as short as the heathen astronomy which rested the earth on the shoulders of Atlas—shorter, in fact, as the suggestion is offered that Atlas was supported by his wife's family. Mr. Benson's assertion that the tariff "taxes imported goods expressly to induce our people to prefer untaxed home products" should be revised by the substitution of coerce for "induce" and accept for "prefer." So amended I have no objection to it as a succinct statement of a fact of which every American citizen should be ashamed. We might go further and qualify the description of home products as "untaxed" by saying that, so far as the buyer is concerned, they are taxed to the amount that the price he pays for them is greater than the price of foreign products minus the duty. For our further confusion Mr. Benson states that protection keeps our money at home, while low tariff has had the effect of sending "money running off to Europe," with "government borrowing it back at the rate of two hundred millions a year." A little thought reveals this in a more tolerable aspect, for if it is better to pay ten to twenty-five per cent advance on the value of the things we buy daily in order to keep our money from "running off to Europe," we are driving a regular Yankee bargain when we borrow it back into the country at only three or four per cent per annum. Mr. Benson does not enlist my sympathies by his reference to the workingman, though I am one myself. I apprehend that if government will confine itself to affairs of state, and cease to disconcert commerce by tariff tinkering, and to gull labor with promises of a full dinner-pail, the business man and the laboring man will be able to take care of themselves. It is rude indeed to speak of tariff as robbery, because it is not indictable. Tariff is wrong, though, in my opinion, and sets up an unjustifiable tax. Sometimes, in these days when there is such a faint line between politics and roguery, I can feel but little more respect for the strong who do a wrong legally and so escape the penalty of their act, than for the weak who do it criminally at the risk of consequences unpleasant to themselves. The purpose of both is the same. They differ only in method, but the latter are more frank and ingenuous.

THE LOGIC OF SUPPRESSION.

There was once a favored country where the truly good held sway,
And made it hot for everyone who didn't go their way.
Of course they had enough to do, the glaring ills to cure,
For we know that to the pure in heart each earthly thing's impure.
They organized societies the Sabbath day to guard,
Transgressors being quickly taught the way of them was hard.
They had their Vice Society to regulate the mails,
And used up all the editors to populate their jails.
The man who took a glass of beer was coppered in a wink—
Communion was the only place where you could get a drink.
They apprehended all the folks who walked the streets of nights,
As also actresses in bronze, and likewise those in tights.
Piano legs wore pantaloons, the statues in the park
Were covered up and not exposed to sight till after dark.
Divorces then were quite unknown, and when a couple wed,
They bunged the woman in a cask and fastened down the head.
There were no scientific men, but those who took their place
Endeavored agriculturally to propagate the race;
I understand they had progressed so far along these lines
That boys grew in potato hills, while girls grew on the vines;
And both were clothed in gunny-sacks alike in all respects,
For it was scandalous to make distinction as to sex.
The women folks were all old maids, as likewise were the males,
They built ten churches on a block to alternate with jails.
And thus did law and order reign, devoid of strife or jars,
For each recalcitrant citizen was safe behind the bars.
So there was heaven on the earth, with joy so full and free,
And every day they organized a new society.
But such things were too good to last, and so there came a pause—
A Mind Your Business League was formed, agreeable to laws,
Which wrought such havoc in the land, allowed to take its course,
That there was not a censor left to put the thing in force.
It emptied all the churches and it filled the jails so full
The doors could scarcely be got to by a united pull.
The last "reformer" in the world, imprisoned though untied,
Put forth his hand between the bars and locked himself inside.

In what he has to say about the "scientists" who find the facts of nature inadequate to their imagined needs, Prof. Max Nordau is more accurate than flattering, but I doubt if the degenerates get at his hands any more of a wallop than they deserve. We can afford to be patient and to exercise charity toward those who are ignorant and are trying to learn, but I cannot perceive that we are under any obligation to respect the reversionists who have once known the truth and are now trying to forget it.

Lecture Notes.

A Sunday like my last one in Boston would certainly give any lecturer agreeable remembrance of a place for a long time. A larger audience greeted me than at any of my previous lectures. The subject was a timely one: "The Tyranny and Absurdity of Sunday Laws." Boston has lately been afflicted by a sickly wave of Sabbatarianism and National Reform Theocracy. The churches demand that everything be closed on Sunday except the house of God, and they have made a special war upon Sunday concerts. The priest cannot endure competition. He knows that when a choice is given between the theater and his temple of superstition, the majority will accept the former. The governor of Massachusetts has given aid and comfort to these religious tyrants by appearing on the platform at their conventions, and making the false statement that this is a Christian nation. When General Booth was in Boston, Greenhalge is reported to have said it was his duty as executive of the state to encourage any movement to advance the Christian religion. This "duty" he holds by usurpation, for the Constitution of Massachusetts gives him no such authority. On Sunday morning I went to hear the Rev. J. M. Foster, the acknowledged leader of National Reformism in New England. He reminded me of the old Puritan preachers of whom we read. Tall, lean, sickly looking, he has the nasal drawl, and gave a harangue that called to my mind the ranters so well described by Scott in "Woodstock." He had a very small congregation, as in his denomination there is no instrumental music, and instead of hymns they sing Psalms. The Reformed Presbyterian church is as near like the church of John Calvin as modern enlightenment will permit.

Boston is probably the most interesting city in America. There is scarcely a spot that does not possess some historic interest, though most of the old landmarks have disappeared. The Common of course remains, as does Faneuil Hall; the old State House that witnessed the Boston massacre; King's Chapel, and the old South Church. I visited Cambridge, where is located the ancient seat of learning, Harvard College, and the residence of our greatest poet, Henry W. Longfellow. Boston Liberals always make a lecturer's visit a pleasant one. I was a guest of the Rush family, was with Mendum at his home in Melrose, with Washburn at Revere, and enjoyed myself in company with Dr. R. K. Noyes and J. F. Foster. I always find a welcome in the Investigator office, with Editor Mendum and his faithful clerk, Ralph W. Chainey.

Once more I am off, this time for De Ruyter, N. Y., a village of six hundred inhabitants in the central part of the state. Here I found excellent arrangements for a lecture made by my friend, W. W. Ames. Mr. Ames edits the Gleaner, a county paper, and has modern improvements in the printer's art, such as are not often found in country paper offices. He is an enthusiastic Liberal, and is not ashamed to show his colors. I arrived on the eve of a snow storm, and my heart sank when I thought of the prospects of an audience, but I was agreeably disappointed, for a good audience greeted me, one-third of whom were women. Four ministers were present, and paid strict attention to everything I said. Freethought is new to the people of De Ruyter, but there is good soil in which it can take root. Mr. John Dean faced the storm, and came nine miles from Truxton to attend. O. H. Maxon, M. E. Tallett and wife, I. E. Smith, H. K. Nash, M. R. Smith, A. W. Francis, M. E. Bendick, H. P. Mitchell, W. E. Miner, and Miss Hattie Poole are staunch Liberals. Mr. Ames entertained me at his home. Mrs. Ames is not a Liberal, but is a sensible Christian woman. She is a member of the Seventh-Day Baptist church. At one time she was an active member of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, but left it when she found it to be a mere tool of the theocrats. FRANKLIN STEINER.

The Campaign Book.

I have the pleasure to report the following donations to the Book Fund: J. P. Miller, Simeon Sharp, F. A. Whitney, J. H. Braffett, P. C. Mosier, P. Fitzgerald. Would be glad to hear from more of our friends. We are in need of many at this present time. The Federation has donated $10 for the defense of Mr. Wise. We also must raise money for the defense of Mr. Fleckten, of Minnesota. We understand that times are hard, but a little from everybody will help us along.

A Memorial.

Thursday, March 28th, I was called to attend the funeral services of Mrs. Jane Connery Cole at Gratiot, Wis. Mrs. Cole died in her eightieth year, on Tuesday, March 26th. Born into the Catholic church, for over half a century she has been a pronounced Freethinker. She was a native of Dunganon, Tyrone county, Ireland. At the age of nine years she came with her parents to this country and lived at Lancaster, Pa. In 1836 she removed to Wisconsin, and was married April 13, 1841, to Samuel Cole. For fifty-three years she has lived in the same house, which was built the following year for their home, and in which both husband and wife died.

Hon. Samuel Cole was a prominent citizen of Gratiot. He was, for eleven years, a member of the state legislature, and for thirty years a justice of the peace. He was always a Freethinker, a subscriber of the Investigator when edited by Abner Kneeland. He died in 1885.

Mrs. Cole leaves four children, Mrs. Mary J. Campbell, wife of Hon. Frank Campbell, of Gratiot; Mrs. Sarah E. Cook, wife of Alfred Cook, of Gratiot, and E. W. Cole and E. J. Cole, also of Gratiot. There are nine grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren. Mrs. Cole was universally loved and respected. Although living in a community largely Catholic, against whose religion she was bravely outspoken, yet she had many friends in the pale of that church who were tenderly devoted to her in her last sickness. They honored her sincerity and venerated her character. Her mind was clear to the very last hour, and unflinching in its loyalty to Freethought. It was her desire that no orthodox services should be held over her grave. It was her earnest wish that the principles of her life might be eloquent in her death. There was a large attendance at the funeral. It was a bright and beautiful day, and nature and humanity seemed to mingle in solemn majesty and repose. Faithfully had our friend labored upon the fields of time. Rich was the harvest of her long life. Priceless the inheritance she has left to her children. Love shall cherish her memory, while in the bosom of the earth she sinks to peaceful rest.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer for one month: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

Letters of Friends.

He Orders Forty-Four Missionaries.

NEW ROSS, IND., March 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For inclosed please send me the following booklets. I want them to loan to my Christian friends: 16 "Federation and Union;" 6 "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" 4 "Age of Reason;" 10 "Examination of Prophecies;" 4 "Bible Morals;" 4 "Church Property."

Since the Remsburg and Steiner lectures here during the winter Liberalism has been gradually growing. And we think there would be a greater advance in the cause of truth, reason, and common sense if Liberals would order more of your Freethought literature to loan and distribute among their young Christian friends.

PHILLIP BRUGH.

Is Very Much in Earnest.

LEON, PA., March 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Language fails me to express my appreciation of "Old Testament Stories," and also of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Haste also forbids, as I want to get this in the next mail. Find inclosed twenty-five cents, for which send the "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child" and "Tribute to Ebou C. Ingersoll."

However, I will take time to say that, should I and my wife or daughter survive Colonel Ingersoll we wish to be wired immediately of his death, and black crape will be hung on our front door and over our front veranda. But I would be glad to know that he would live a thousand years to push the glorious cause.

Yours in haste, FRANK COOK.

This Means You.

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 3, 1895.

DEAR FRIENDS: I intend going to New York state to visit my brother and sister and other kinsfolk and old neighbors and friends. I shall start about the 5th of May and stay till September. I haven't quite enough money to go on, so I ask you to send for circulars of my books, and please order some of them of me, so I can mail them before I start. Each subscription to Little Freethinker will help along. It is the only paper published for the young that is free from superstition. Send 50 cents, and try it for one year, or 25 cents for six months. Sample, three cents. Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Palaski county, Virginia.

Times are hard, and I would not think of traveling, but brother and sister, as well as myself, are "in the sere and yellow leaf," and we may never again have a summer together.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Does not Admire Them.

PEASTER, TEX., March 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.50 to pay my passage on THE TRUTH SEEKER craft another year, and for two copies of "Crimes of Preachers." I love to show up the preachers and their infamous calling, for I have less respect for them than any other class of individuals. While such grand men as Ingersoll, Putnam, Remsburg, and Steiner are shedding the light for thousands, and bringing many to see how they have been duped by religion and priestcraft, I, in my humble way, am trying to do what good I can, and by the help of your paper, and such books as "Champions of the Church," "Bible of Bibles," the "World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," "Conflict Between Religion and Science," and "Dynamic Theory," I have had the pleasure of seeing a number of individuals convinced that religion and priestcraft are humbugs and a disgrace to humanity. With best wishes for the prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause, I remain,

J. S. WHITE.

Post Putnam Echoes at Trinidad.

TRINIDAD, COL., March 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Secular Pilgrim has come and gone, but the Secular cause goes marching on, all the efforts and assertions of the Christians to the contrary notwithstanding. Putnam delivered his first lecture to a small audience, but at each succeeding lecture his audience grew larger until Sunday evening, the night of the discussion between Rabbi Freudenthal and Mr. Putnam, there were at least one hundred people turned away who could not get seats, and all this in the face of the fact that there were two revivals going on all of the time that Mr. Putnam was here. Taking everything into consideration, we think we have just cause to be proud of the progress we have made, and besides, there has been a vast amount of Liberal literature distributed, and that, you know, will work while the Secular Pilgrim is off proselyting in other fields. Since Putnam left we have organized a local branch of the Freethought Federation, and I am going to try to secure Mrs. Freeman for a series of lectures.

Yours, etc., JNO. L. SCHULTZ.

Devils Galore.

DAVENPORT, WASH., March 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your most excellent paper comes regularly to our abode, and does its full share in ministering to our comfort and amusement. The only disappointment that ever occurs is to tear off the wrapper and find no cartoons; but knowing that there always are many good things on the inside we are reconciled at once. "Observations" have to be digested first. They are always truthful and to the point. I have been trying to work in with you on the missionary scheme, but I believe I will have to give it up for the present. The hard times have played havoc in this part of the country, and we have to sell our produce for less than cost of production. But it seems to be water on the wheels of church mills, for revivals and other church games have been in full blast all winter. For all that, the three Methodist divines don't seem to have got the upper hand of the devil yet. The other night one declared that a devil was on each side of every person in the house, and numbers of devils on top of the house besides. That appears most devilish, and I don't see how people dare to go there. Dancing seems to have got its share of attention and denunciation. Such remarks as "ladies laying their heads on the shoulders of men," "heart beating against heart," and "entanglement of lower extremities," etc., go to prove the utter depravity of the utterer of such nonsense. For I believe that every dancer will bear me out in the assertion that impure motives are not among his incentives. I have been told that a marshal has been summoned to keep order in God's house. I will try to raise a little money for Mr. Fleckten and Mr. Wise.

Find $1 for renewal. P. SELDE, SR.

Don't Like to be Cheated.

NEW BOSTON, MICH., March 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed $6.00 please send me Paine's "Common Sense," the ANNUAL, and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

Your paper is almost an absolute necessity to me. If I were without it I might come to think that nearly all the world was orthodox. Thinkers are very scarce in churchvilles. Heresy is only occasionally found hereabouts, and then it is not much more than unreasoning revulsion against some church member for cheating at a horse trade or ox sale. I tell you there is much to be done yet before we can all testify that we are free from superstition.

I daily thank the good writers, the noble speakers, and myself that I am clean-washed in (not the blood of the lamb, or any other metaphorical animal), but the juice or essence of Reason. I reasoned myself free from superstition, aided by a theological course. It took about ten years as it was. If I had been without the dogmas of theology, I probably would never have been free and happy.

The recent Methodist Episcopal revival here secured about thirty converts. One of them evidently was completely converted. As I was telling her that I considered it only a slight difference of development in civilization which was exhibited at Savannah and at Hoboken, she said an Infidel lecturer ought to be stopped. "He ought to be killed; I'd like to kill him, and I would, too, if I had a chance." I replied, "You surely have the old-fashioned Christian spirit."

I tell you, Mr. Editor, there is much yet to do. I find that the habits of close mathematical reasoning, of earnest inquiry, and of rigid testing that are established in a school or college course are very good safeguards indeed against dogma. I teach no theology nor religion, or their anti's, in my school; but I feel that my work is going to be fruitful in making inquirers and reasoners. I am content to leave the result in the hands of Psycho, if there be such a god. F. C. ROMINE.

Ministers Fear Competing Attractions.

CODORUS, PA., March 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for renewal of subscription to the best paper on the earth. I would rather do without one meal each day than be without THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A bill is pending in the Pennsylvania legislature to legalize the Sunday publication, exposure for sale, and delivery of newspapers. The bill provides for the repeal of all laws, or parts of laws, inconsistent therewith. The clergy have just led in a mass meeting protesting against the adoption of this measure, which their resolutions say would be a "lasting disgrace" to the commonwealth.

Last summer when the park was thrown open for concerts on Sunday, the sky-pilots gained a victory by having the concerts discontinued. Next they banded together with the Young Christian Endeavorers, and other pious societies, and did all in their power to keep the street cars from running on Sunday. But with all their hurling of anathemas they could not succeed.

Yours for liberty,
J. W. F. COPENHEAVER.

A Brave, True Man.

CLINTON, IA., March 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: With feelings of sadness I inform you of the parting from a loving wife and family, of a friend and brother, Lorenzo D. Dutton, who died at his home near Grand Mound, Ia., on March 13, 1895, at the age of 76 years 8 months and 15 days. We seem to be unable to do much to give comfort in such an affliction as the loss of a dear husband and father, but it is our duty to do what we can to cheer and console in such times of trial and loss. Lorenzo D. Dutton was a lifelong, consistent Freethinker. He was kind and considerate with all his neighbors and acquaintances, whether entertaining views similar to his own or not; and his own life was passed in such a way that all could see his honesty of purpose, and he died as he had lived, an honest unbeliever in so-called Christianity.

It was the wish of the deceased to have his remains cremated, but as he saw it would cause considerable expense to his surviving family, he decided upon inhumation; so his remains were laid away in the usual manner on the afternoon of Friday, the 15th inst. The ceremonies were conducted by S. P. Putnam to the satisfaction of all present.

Lorenzo D. Dutton was born in Champaign county, N. Y., June 28, 1818. In January, 1837, he went to Potter county, Pa., and engaged in lumbering. In the spring of 1838, in company with an uncle, he went to Madison, Ind., where he engaged with his uncle in the mercantile business; managed store for him one year in New Castle, Ky. In the spring of 1841 he came to Clinton county, Ia., whither his father and three brothers had preceded him in 1839. In the spring of 1850 he went overland to California in company with his brother Jerome, returning in the fall of 1854 to Clinton county, where he has since resided. On December 6, 1856, he married Miss Sarah H. Allison, who, with the following children, survive him: Chas. A., of Hartley, Ia.; Orisni and L. D., Jr., of Grand Mound; Mrs. Wm. Mellon, of Santa Cruz, Cal.; Mrs. Geo. B. King, of Dixon, Ia.; and Nannie, Belle, Orpha, and May, of Grand Mound. Of his brothers: Jerome died in 1892, Leroy in 1894, and Charles, now the only survivor, at the age of 71, lives on his farm near Grand Mound; and no better man breathes to-day.

JAMES A. GREENHILL.

BLAINE, WASH., March 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I hardly expected a reply to that clipping, but it seems that these ministers never miss a chance to get in something that they think has a tendency to belittle the Ingersolls. When I read the reported language of the Rev. Haweis about Miss Ingersoll I believed it false, hence sent it to you to do as you saw fit with. Should I have an opportunity to meet the gentleman, I can assure you that he is pretty apt to be reminded of it.

Last winter, 1893-94, there was a Congregationalist evangelist holding a series of revival meetings in conjunction with the Methodist church at Blaine. I frequently went to hear him, and one night I went with a friend and we took seats in the back end of the church. The room was crowded so that quite a number were standing. The preacher was in the middle of his discourse, giving hard thumps to the great Infidels of the past, and finally he said, "Col. Robert G. Ingersoll said that in ten years there would be more theaters than churches built." Well, it so happened that this same day I had read a letter over the Colonel's signature saying that he never said so. It shocked me when the minister said what he did, and I called out in a loud voice, "He never said it! He never said it!" It halted the gentleman, and he asked me to keep quiet and he would see me at the close of the services. Well, he came back and saw me, and wanted to know what I did it for. I said he was not telling the truth and I also had the document to prove it. He said the reporters usually told the truth. I told him I didn't care anything about the reporters, but that story was untrue. There was a large crowd taking this all in. Finally we arranged that I was to meet him at his room the next day at 4 P.M. I was there on time armed with a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I showed him. He had to acknowledge his error, which was all I asked. The next night he referred to it, but tried to make the error slight. When I went to see him I took also a copy of "Infidel Death-beds." I wanted to know how it was so many of the greatest men were unbelievers. He said I could not name one that he could not offset by naming another on the Christian side. I named Chas. Darwin. He claimed he was not an unbeliever. "Infidel Death-beds" was produced, which settled that. Then he was asked if he believed that such an honest, upright man as Darwin would be eternally punished by any God, but he said he did not care to answer my question. Making up my mind that he was a hypocrite, after having stood in the pulpit night after night telling the people that unbelief was the crime of all crimes, we parted. I had no more use for his preaching.

With best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am Sincerely, JOHN W. MERRITT.

For the Love of God.

OAK PARK, ILL., March 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose herewith a slip cut from the Rocky Mountain News, Denver, Col., of March 12th, merely as corroborative evidence of the "loving kindness" which doth so hedge about the brethren of the cloth.

Apropos of spelling reform, why not change the word crucifixion to crucifiction, thus causing the orthography to assist in bringing out the truth concerning a somewhat mythical event?

Fraternally, A. CHAPMAN.

Secretary Thomson of the Humane society met with one of the greatest surprises of his life last evening. As a result of the shock which Mr. Thomson sustained, Rev. L. L. Kneeland, who says he is a minister of the Baptist church in charge of the Eighth-street mission, will be arraigned before Justice Cater at 9.30 o'clock this morning on the charge of cruelty to animals. The case promises to be one of the greatest interest to the members of the Humane society, as Secretary Thomson declares he will camp on the minister's trail until justice is fully meted out.

The discovery of Mr. Kneeland's cruelty was brought about by a trip which Mr. Thomson was making down Sixteenth street at 5.30 last evening. Arriving at Sixteenth and Stout streets Mr. Thomson's attention was attracted by two emaciated horses that were standing hitched to a carriage on the northeast side of the street. "I have seen many distressed looking animals in the course of my experience," remarked Mr. Thomson, "but I think the two horses at Sixteenth and Stout streets carried off the palm as living specimens of starvation."

Mr. Thomson says he was informed that the horses had stood hitched in the street since 9 o'clock in the morning, and had in that time been given neither food nor water. He drove the horses to a livery stable and proceeded to Justice Oater's court, where he swore out a warrant for "John Doe."

"I went to my office," said Mr. Thomson, in relating his unusual experience, "with the warrant in my pocket. Hardly had I taken a chair when a dapper looking man, with white necktie, black frock coat and shining tile walked into the room."

"Are you Mr. Thomson?" he asked.

"I am; what will you have?"

"I desire to know what right you have to take possession of my horses?" warmly inquired the new comer."

Mr. Thomson says he asked the name of the stranger. The man gave his name as L. L. Kneeland.

"What is your business?" inquired the secretary.

"I am a preacher," was the reply.

Mr. Thomson says he nearly fainted at the nerve of the man, and inquired, "For pity's sake, what denomination do you claim?"

The man said he was a Baptist and was in charge of the Eighth-street mission.

"Then you could have knocked me down with a feather," remarked Mr. Thomson in telling the story. He immediately placed Kneeland under arrest and conveyed him to Oater's court, and had the time of trial set for 9.30 this morning. When Mr. Thomson left the court the Rev. Mr. Kneeland was resting in charge of the court.

Mr. Thomson gave orders at the livery stable that the horses shall not be allowed to be taken out without a written order from himself. He was highly indignant at the condition of the animals, and the suave manner of the prisoner with the silk hat did not modify his feeling of contempt for the man.

Rev. Lerwick L. Kneeland has been a resident of Denver for a number of years. He is the son of Dr. Willis C. Kneeland, who lives at 100 Grant avenue. He was until recently pastor of the Mt. Olivet Baptist church, but has lately been devoting his time to the Eighth-street mission. He has always borne a good reputation.

Two Important Quotations.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of this week the silly comments of the Chicago Tribune relative to Colonel Ingersoll's Hoboken lecture, and as a contrast I inclose the editorial of the Sacramento Record-Union on the same subject, which cannot but be pleasing to your readers. It shows that not all the editors of our daily papers are under the baneful influence of priestcraft and superstition. I also inclose a clipping from the Evening Star of this city, which shows that THE TRUTH SEEKER was right when it contended that Frederick Douglass was a Freethinker, although the clergy claim he was a Christian. I had the pleasure of listening to Mr. Douglass's address last fall before the Colored Literary Society of this city on the subject of slavery. It was an able and eloquent address, and although a little shy of attacking the church, I suspected from many things he said that he was not in love with the church; indeed, I felt that were he free to speak his mind candidly, he would have scored the church as severely as ever Colonel Ingersoll did, but he well knew from his peculiar position as leader of the Negro race that such a course would bring censure and opprobrium upon him [and his cause] from his orthodox Christian neighbors.

It is safe to assert, therefore, that Frederick Douglass belongs in the ranks of the great Freethinkers of this century.

J. J. SHIRLEY, M.D.

This is the Sacramento Record-Union's editorial—not a false note in it:

INTOLERANCE RUN MAD.

Intolerance ran mad at Hoboken, when ministers of Protestant churches on Sunday last attempted to prevent "Bob" Ingersoll from lecturing on the Bible. They prevailed upon the weak-kneed mayor to close the theater in which Mr. Ingersoll was to speak. When he was confronted with the law the mayor was compelled to, and reluctantly did, recall the order. An appeal was then made to the chief of police to interfere, on the ground that the lecture might provoke a breach of the peace, but this also failed.

Colonel Ingersoll delivered his lecture in peace and quiet, and before an intelligent audience. That he did not fail to score the clergy who sought to prevent him from exercising the right of free speech is not surprising. He very properly said that the spirit manifested by the intolerant clergymen was precisely the same that would justify his seizure and subject him to the stake and the blazing jagot because he chose to speak of the Bible as he reads it. There was a time, he added, when this kind of "holy office" was not only lawful, but held to be in the service of God, but that time has passed forever.

Tuesday night in the city of Savannah intolerance in another form was manifested, and this time it was not set against an Infidel, but religion against religion. An ex-priest and his wife proposed to lecture against the Catholic church, and thereupon a howling mob assembled and broke the windows of the building and attempted to lynch the lecturers. As in the first case, so in this, the manifestation was "in the service of God," in defense of "the true faith," and was the intolerance which forbids a man to think or speak except as another dictates.

The mayor of Savannah, who is a Jew, gave those who sought to induce him to close the hall against the lecturer a bit of advice that is concentrated wisdom and clean-out sense, two qualities that do not distinguish the intolerant religionist. The mayor said to the objectors: "Those who think they will be offended by the lecture have only to remain away from it. Thus no one's human right will be infringed, and there will be no breach of the peace."

To the credit of one of the Catholic clergy he said that he gave like advice, but not until after the mob had gathered and troops had to be called out to disperse it and protect the lecturer from violence. That clergyman then told the fanatics that they were disgracing their religion, that the ex-priest could do them no harm, and he should have added, can do the truth no harm.

The truth can always afford to stand in the light and to suffer any assault. The religion that cannot hold its own in debate, or refute charges laid at its door, is a religion that it is better abandoned than embraced. But it cannot be concealed that the same teaching which propelled the clergy of Hoboken against Ingersoll led on the mob against Slattery. Between the two there is, in that respect, not the slightest difference. Each teaches that it alone represents the true faith, and that all others are false, and worthy of suppression by force. In each case it was the spirit of the stake and the jagot.

The church, be it Protestant, Catholic, or other, which gives cause for intolerance, which breeds the spirit of persecution, is at enmity with the institutions of liberty, a relic of savagery, and the rule of might.

It is deplorable that in two cities in the republic there should, within one week, have been made manifest the truth that there still exists that slavery of the soul which makes men little better than beasts [or considerably worse—Ed T. S.].

It is to the honor of his race that a Jew should have risen up to rebuke the devotees of a religion that contemns him, and to teach the fanatic and intolerant that in this day and age free speech is the dearest of rights, and that the truth never seeks to muzzle it.

At a memorial meeting held by the colored people of Baltimore, Rev. John W. Beckett read a letter written to him three years ago when he was pastor of the Metropolitan church of Washington, and which was in reply to one written by the clergyman to Frederick Douglass urging him to ally himself more closely with his church. Here are two significant paragraphs from the letter of Mr. Douglass:

I do not feel it my duty to join any of the many sects now arrogating to themselves the title of the Church of Christ and considering all outside of them "ashamed of Jesus."

The Christianity of this country, as exhibited in the churches, is not the Christianity of Christ. It is a man-degrading and negro-hating Christianity. In the South it lived and flourished side by side with slavery for two hundred years, and never had any quarrel with it, and in its presence to-day the negro is robbed, lynched, and murdered without remonstrance from the Christian pulpits.

A Dialog, Mat. iv, 8.

INFIDEL.

As you are now a man of prayer, I think it only right and fair that I (although I speak in rhyme) should claim a little of your time. In asking you to just explain some things that I have tried in vain to understand, accept, believe, although I now repine and grieve that, notwithstanding all I do, these statements all appear untrue. I now refer to statements in The book containing tales of sin; The book that you allege is free from myths, and lies, and sophistry; The book that shows Jehovah's plan for saving sinful, wicked man. One gospel, mythologic tale (As true as Jonah ate the whale) Says Christ and Satan took a stroll To see if they could see the whole,

And ascertain the intrinsic worth Of ev'ry kingdom of the earth. When standing on a piece of ground That shows a figure nearly round, I always fail, you know, to see The side that's opposite to me. Now, when they both took up their stand, They could not see much of the land; Besides, twelve thousand miles away, They were without the light of day; They must have had good optic sight To see through darkness of the night. Now, as I do intend to pray, As soon as I can see my way To swallow all such tales as true, I hope, my Christian friend, that you Will try to do your very best To set my doubting mind at rest. Please tell me while we here abide How Satan saw the other side?

CHRISTIAN.

My honest skeptic friend, 'tis true You've given me a task to do That any sentient person may Most easily explain away. The wily question you have put Is very easily answered, but, Before I make the matter plain, Allow me now to just explain The kingdoms of the world, 'twould seem, Old Satan saw while in a dream. This explanation, you will see, With holy writ does not agree. But do not fret, and pine, and grieve, But pray in faith and just believe. I will now do my very best To set your doubting mind at rest. They both performed a feat quite rare By sailing miles up in the air, And as you know it is a fact The earth is always in the act Of turning on its axis round, Then ev'ry inch and foot of ground Would show itself, as you may prove, To people stationed up above. 'Twas from this elevated place Old Satan saw the whole of space. I hope, my skeptic friend, you see That faith removes all mystery.

NOTE.—What induced me to write this dialog was one recited in a church by school children. The writer had built himself up an Infidel man of straw; had manufactured a lot of idiotic nonsense, which no Infidel had ever uttered, in order to enable the Christian to pulverize the Infidel with his spiritual jawbone. I claim I have done better with the Christian, for I have certainly put into his mouth the best scientific answer that can be given.

Perhaps the following dialog will suit your "Parson's" corner. In England the law is very strict against poachers—men who catch game on rich men's preserves without permission. One Sunday morning, as one of these illegal hunters was returning home after he had spent the Saturday night hunting, he was met by the village parson, who knew him well. "O John!" says the parson, "what a shame and disgrace to see you returning home, on the good Lord's day, with that black eye, velvet coat, dog, and gun. John, if you don't repent and reform the devil will get you sure." "Let us see," said John; "isn't it about twelve thousand years since the devil was thrown into the bottomless pit?" "Yes," says the parson, "I think it is." "Well," says John, "you have read Joicey's 'Scientific Dialogs,' haven't you?" "Yes." "Joicey says that anything whose specific gravity is greater than that of the atmosphere will fall 13 feet the first second, 26 the second, 39 the third, 52 the fourth; and so on, increasing in arithmetical ratio 13 feet every second; is that so?" "Yes, John; I dare say it is." "If that be so, parson, the devil must now be traveling at a tremendous velocity, and if God throws me into the bottomless pit, the devil will never get me, for when I begin to fall the devil will be going at so much greater velocity than me that we would get further away from each other."

J. P.

Mortuary—Melissa A. Jamieson.

Melissa A. Jamieson was born in Albion, Mich., May 8, 1838, reaching the age of fifty-six years, ten months, and two days, departing this life March 10, 1895, at her home three miles west of Mosca, Col. In 1856 she was married to W. F. Jamieson, by whom she has had eight children, six living.

Nearly all her life she has been more fond of travel than her husband, and no fatigue did she bear more cheerfully than travel.

She did not merely believe in a future life—she was a Spiritualist and knew to a positive conviction, according to the claims of Spiritualists, that after the sufferings of her fragile body here she would live in a spiritual realm where she would welcome her Agnostic husband, who has been in doubt many years concerning that sphere of existence where kindred minds will dwell in harmony forever, advancing in knowledge and happiness. He says, If there is a future life he is satisfied that her beautiful philosophy is true. On many occasions she and her husband have conversed together upon the question of the future; she often declared that the spiritual experiences of her husband, years ago, were sufficient for her. She asked no better proofs; but, in addition, she was possessed of deep spiritual intuition that gave her unbounded comfort.

The conversations were always in love for the truth and for each other. As Mr. Bridgman remarked at the services: "One look upon this sweet face, smiling in death, should satisfy all who see the sleeper that she was the soul of sincerity and the very embodiment of charity; angel while she lived here, and surely no less loving and angelic in the spiritual world where there are no grievous partings; where Spiritualists hold she is now free from pain. Her body we bury. Her spirit is conscious, victorious over death."

She often said there are hells enough on earth. She believed all will be finally happy, and all rewarded according to the good they do on earth and hereafter.

In no sense was she a believer in orthodox theology. She was too kind, too loving to believe that.

Their two daughters reside in Michigan, have been married several years, and are so comfortably situated in good homes of their own, surrounded by their happy-voiced children, that no amount of persuasion could ever induce them to follow father and mother to what is commonly considered by Eastern people the "wilds of Colorado."

The oldest son, Claude, is a printer in Michigan. Clarence has been for eight years in the employ of a physician in Chicago, and he wrote, in response to his father's urgent request to come and see his mother: "If it were possible for me to do so I would take the first train for Mosca. I love my mother. I hope her sickness is not so serious as you think."

This letter was received when she lay in her casket ready for burial.

Harry Jamieson, another son, is growing an orange and walnut grove near Los Angeles, California.

Percy, the youngest, is at school in Missouri.

And this is the common history of scattered members and families as they reach the estate of manhood and womanhood. There are few exceptions, strive as we will to keep the loved ones near, and the family unbroken. Death, at last, will frustrate our efforts to preserve family union. But there is one thing which conquers "all-conquering death," and that is love. The absent ones are loved as intensely as if they were present. The dear departed just gone from our mortal sight is still loved by husband, sons and daughters—an undying love.

Mrs. Jamieson was passionately fond of music, painting, and the drama, and in her travels with her husband was always ready to attend opera or theater, for they both got good out of them.

Of her it was said by Mr. Jamieson, who dedicated one of his booklets to her three years ago:

TO MY WIFE.

Sunny with hope; cheerful amid life's burdens and discouragements; my best friend, never-failing; companion of my youth, who has brought me joy for thirty-five years of married life—and without whose presence and sympathy existence would be shorn of its chief charm—I affectionately dedicate this volume.

And his condition of bereavement is now actualized.

TO MY NEIGHBORS.

Your loving attentions to my wife during her long illness brought peace to her heart and mine.

Her pathway toward the great future (whither we are all hastening with the speed of Time's swift flying feet) was strewn with the flowers of joy, sympathy, humanitarian help by your neighborly hands.

Your words of comfort, and your practical assistance to me, in my dark hour of bereavement, I shall remember as long as life lasts.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

To Dorothy.

I know where there is honey in a jar.
Met for a certain little friend of mine,
And Dorothy, I know where daisies are
That only wait small hands to intertwine
A wreath for such a golden head as thine.

The thought that thou art coming makes all glad.
The house is bright with blossoms high and low,

And many a little lass and little lad
Expectantly are running to and fro.
The fire within our hearts is all aglow.

We want thee, child, to share in our delight
On this high day, the holiest and best.
Because 'twas then, ere youth had taken flight,
Thy grandmamma, of women loveliest,
Made me of men most honored and most blest.

That naughty boy who led thee to suppose
He was thy sweetheart has, I grieve to tell,
Been seen to pick the garden's choicest rose
And tattle with it to another belle.
Who does not treat him altogether well.

But mind not that, or let it teach thee this—
To waste no love on any youthful rover.
All youths are rovers, I assure thee, miss.
No, if thou wouldst true constancy discover,
Thy grandpapa is perfect as a lover.

So come, thou playmate of my closing day,
The latest treasure life can offer me.
And with thy baby laughter make us gay.
Thy fresh young voice shall sing, my Dorothy,
Songs that shall bid the feet of sorrow flee.

W. E. GLADSTONE.

Boys and Their Playmates.

Don't snub a boy because he wears shabby clothes. When Edison, the inventor, first entered Boston, he wore a pair of yellow linen breeches in the depth of winter.

Don't snub a boy because of the ignorance of his parents. Shakespere, the world's poet, was the son of a man who was unable to write his own name.

Don't snub a boy because his home is plain and unpretending. Abraham Lincoln's early home was a plain and unpretending log cabin.

Don't snub a boy because he chooses a humble trade. The author of "Pilgrim's Progress" was a tinker.

Don't snub a boy because of his physical disability. Milton was blind.

Don't snub a boy because of dullness in his lesson. Hogarth, the celebrated painter and engraver, was a stupid boy at his books.

Don't snub a boy because he stutters. Demosthenes, the great orator of Greece, overcame a harsh and stammering voice.

Don't snub him for any reason, not only because he may some day outstrip you in the race of life, but because it is neither kind nor right.—New York Recorder.

Correspondence.

MCPHERSON, KAN., March 13, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have read the Children's Corner for over two years. Papa takes the Little Freethinker for us children. It is a very nice paper for little children, and is fifty cents a year. I often wonder how many children of the Corner read it. I am eleven years old. I am a Bohemian by birth. I would be glad to have some little boys or girls about my age write to me, and I would gladly answer.

Your Liberal friend,
MAT P. KUBIN.

[Another bright young Freethinker.—Ed. C. C.]

HEBER CITY, March 12, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to the Corner. The snow is pretty near gone, and the roads are very muddy. I am glad it is coming spring. We have been going to school all winter, but had to stop going on account of the bad roads. I am in the third reader. My teacher's name is Mr. George Wootton. I like him very well for a teacher.

Hoping to see this in print, I remain your little friend, CHRISTEENA LINDSAY.
[Improve every opportunity and learn a little every day, whether in school or out.—Ed. C. C.]

KREBS, I. T., March 18, 1895.

MISS SUSAN WIXON, Dear Friend: My sister has promised to write to you again.

When she saw her letter in print she was pleased with it, but as she is very busy and has written a letter to a little Freethinker, I will take her place and will let you know about Krebs and its surroundings. Krebs is a mining camp of one thousand inhabitants, and surrounded south by McAllester and Alderson, and they are all mining camps. Our Christian people baptized thirty-two Negroes to-day, but we were too late to see the fun. Some time ago the preachers made their boasts that they would not take any money of any infidel, but when it came to pay for their lumber and workmen, they had to come to those unbelievers at last. My age is ten years. We remain, Your little Freethinkers,
DORA and HANNAH BECKER.

[Dora writes a good letter, and we are proud of her. But she must pay a little more attention to spelling, and write with ink next time.—Ed. C. C.]

MYRTLE POINT, OR., Feb. 23, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wish to inform you that I have read your good works, and highly recommend your writing. I am a strong believer in your ideas and in the cause of Freethought and reason, and I glory in the men and women who take those ideas for their belief. I have also read Helen H. Gardener's writings and I am well pleased with her good judgment. I have been a close observer and I have read both sides of the question with the above-mentioned result. Therefore I recommend you to stand firm to your opinions, which I know are right. I hope you will pardon my liberty in writing to you, but I wished to inform you that I am one of your belief.
FRANK P. HERMAN.

[Such letters as the above are a source of pleasure and inspiration. We take courage to persevere in our work when we are assured that our labors are appreciated. We thank our friend for his kind words. May his years be long in the world and his life happy.—Ed. C. C.]

GRANT'S PASS, OR., Feb. 14, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is storming, and I thought I would write to the Corner. They have a Sunday-school here, and about ten attend it. The religious people are divided into seven denominations.

My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for about three or four years, and thinks he could not do without it. My playmates who believe are afraid of something after night, but we who don't are not afraid. How is it?

We live in Southern Oregon, and seven miles from the railroad. I have heard my father and others say that this is a good climate. We planted apples, peaches, prunes, pears, and berries, and raised some vegetables to sell. I am in the fourth reader, and was ten years old last October. And if I can see this in your beloved Corner, I would be very glad. I vote for a children's paper. Yours truly,
WILLIE A. RICHARDS.

[A brave, straightforward, sensible boy is Willie, who is not afraid of his shadow. Investigate, reason, reflect, and improve every opportunity. The world waits for such a man as Willie is to be by and by.—Ed. C. C.]

CHICAGO, ILL., March 3, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I inclose a letter of my daughter Alice, from which you can see that she delights very much in your part of the work in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She is only eight years old, but is a very bright little girl for her age.

Now, dear Miss Wixon, as you know yourself, the most of our popular Readers and other books for children are greatly sprinkled with the ideas of a superstitious system. These things are, of course, very undesirable for those who want to educate their children in accordance with nothing else but the laws of nature. I therefore ask you kindly to recommend me some of the books which would contain less of the stumbling-blocks for a Freethinking mind. Besides Alice, I have three more children below her age, and so you will see that I have quite a mission to perform in my own family. Very respectfully yours,
J. MASLEY.

[Nearly all books for the young are, more or less, permeated with superstitious

MONEY FOR EVERYONE!

I can't understand why people complain of hard times, when any woman or man can make from $5 to $10 a day easily. All have heard of the wonderful success of the Climax Dish Washer; yet we are apt to think we can't make money selling it; but anyone can make money, because every family wants one. I made $472.86 in the last three months, after paying all expenses and attending to my regular business besides. You don't have to canvass; as soon as people know you have it for sale they send for a Dish Washer. Address the Climax Mfg. Co., Columbus, Ohio, for particulars. Go to work at once, and you will very soon have a full pocket book and a light heart. I think it a duty to inform each other of such opportunities, and I also think it a duty to improve them while we may. Try it at once, and publish your experience so others may be benefited.

ideas. It is lamentable that this is so, but so it is. We would recommend Mrs. Slenker's "Little Lessons," and Dr. E. B. Foote's "Science in Story," and our own "Story Hour" for children. Our last book, "Right Living," has met with excellent favor in the training of children. Our friend will do well to send for The Truth Seeker Company's Catalog of books, from which he may make a good selection of reading matter.—Ed. C. C.]

ALICE'S LETTER.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I like very much to read in the Children's Corner, and I am trying to learn to play that splendid hymn which begins "Lay me low." I hope that you will send us some more like that one.
ALICE MASLEY.

[Alice is only eight. What may we not expect from her by the time she is eighteen!—Ed. C. C.]

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., March 16, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I have never written to you before; therefore perhaps it would be in order for me to make my best bow to the children and explain who I am and why I write now.

"Firstly," I have no children of my own to take up my time, but I am acquainted with many in Oregon and some of their teachers in the Portland Secular Sunday-school, to all of whom I send greeting, but not a holy kiss. By the way, perhaps you don't remember Miss Nettie Olds, who is a splendid lecturer and teacher out there now. Well, if you don't I will tell you that she once wrote an excellent article for the Children's Corner, when she was a child, describing her journey (in her father's carriage) across the Willamette valley from McMinnville to the Indian reservation and school. Since then she has grown from a girl to a splendid woman, and can play the piano or violin in concert with her brother (or alone), and can interest an intelligent audience as few can. I want to ask an answer to a question in philosophy (or several questions) of our little Freethought friends in Oregon and Washington: Which way do the fir-trees twist? I found them to always twist the same way when living shingles, so that the shingles always twisted the same way before I shaved them. But I have forgotten which way. Any shingle-maker who rives shingles can tell you, if he has noticed and remembers, if I am right. Which way do bean vines go around the poles set for them? Which way do hops wind around the poles? Do the stalks twist the same way that they wind around the poles? Does other vegetation twist in the same way? Will some one who has traveled tell me if plants and trees twist the same way south of the equator? I am still trying to partake of the fruit of the tree of knowledge.
Your friend, GEO. F. ELLIOTT.

[Yes, we do remember Nettie Olds, and we are watching her career with the greatest interest. We shall always be proud that she is one of the graduates from our Corner, and we know she will do good wherever she may be.

Now, we expect the above questions will all be answered by our bright-eyed, observing readers. One of our fundamental precepts is to be watchful and observing. The keen, discerning, questioning mind is not the one to be led astray by fable or blind ignorant faith. We thank you, Bro. Elliot, for your kind letter to the Corner.—Ed. C. C.]

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

	" Christians and Mohammedans.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

Not for Parsons.

"MADAM, would you kindly subscribe something for the missions in Africa? The money will be used for the conversion of heathen children." "V-ry well; you may hav a few children converted, and send the bill to me."—Fliegende Blaetter.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER: "The prodigal son suffered dreadfully for his wickedness in running away from home; but when he returned his father forgave him and killed the fatted calf." The new pupil: "But what did he kill the fatted calf for? Hadn't he stayed at home all the time?"

A FUNNY incident occurred in the Galt, Ont., police court a week or so ago. A well-known citizen, a staunch Presbyterian, has the very common failing of getting drunk, and when in that condition not unfrequently ill-uses his family. He is very vindictive against unbelievers, and on the last occasion of his falling from grace it was therefore with some satisfaction that the myrmidons of the law landed our friend in the lock-up. On the following morning this dialog took place. Magistrate: "What, Thomas, here again! Well, I do not see what I can do but send you up for thirty days." Thomas: "Weel, yer honor, we took a wee drap owre mucke, and we dunna want ye to be ower hard on us. We dunna mind bein' lockit up for the rest o' the week, but we'd verra much like tae get oot on Saturday night, for we're gaun tae hae a noo meenister in oor kirk on the Sabbath, and we would like tae got oot tae hear him." The obliging magistrate made the order accordingly, but threatened to make it up with interest on the next occasion of misbehavior.—Secular Thought.

IT WAS NO OBSTACLE.

A clergyman relates that during his residence in Kentucky, a lady, a friend of his, was in the habit of inviting several friends to spend Christmas with her. In anticipation of the joyous season, she usually raised a brood of turkeys, and selected the largest and fattest of them for the Christmas dinner.

On one occasion a turkey weighing about eighteen pounds had been killed and properly dressed, and was hung in the larder awaiting the proper time to be cooked.

That evening, Dinah, the cook, received a call from several of her friends, and as the conversation turned on Christmas and its festivities she could not resist the temptation to exhibit the turkey.

Every mouth in the company at once began to water. They besought Dinah to let them hav it. At first she indignantly refused, but at length, as they persisted in their entreaties, and promised to bring her another before Christmas equally as good, she yielded, and they went away happy in the possession of the fowl.

On Christmas morning her friends returned, bringing with them a turkey of about the same general dimensions as the one they had received, but resembling it in no other way. It was lean and lank, and looked as if it had not been fed for a month.

Dinah was at her wits' ends. No end of basting and turning could make it resemble the plump bird she had stolen. She gazed at it ruefully, but there was no way out of her dilemma, so she was obliged to place it on the table and face the music.

The mistress noticed that it was not the same turkey as soon as it was placed before her, but said nothing.

As soon as her guests were gone she went to the kitchen and accosted Dinah.

"That was not the turkey I raised, Dinah. What did you do with it?"

"For de Lawd, Missy, dat turkey done cook all away to nothen. All de fat fry out," protested Dinah.

The mistress made no reply, but concluded to wait awhile and see if Dinah would confess her wrongdoing.

The next Sunday was the first in the month, and Dinah, who was a professedly devout communicant of the church, was promptly in her place at the beginning of the services. Her mistress was also a communicant, and watched with interest to see if Dinah would partake of the holy communion.

But Dinah, apparently, had no conscientious scruples to keep her away. She knelt at the altar rail as devoutly as if her conscience had been devoid of guilt.

On their return home the mistress called her servant to her, and, in a tone of mild reproach, said:

"Oh, Dinah, how could you go to the holy table with such a load of sin on your soul?"

"I ain't got no sin on my soul, Missy," was the reply.

"Why, Dinah, not after you stole that turkey and gave it to your friends, and then lied about it?"

"Oh, la, Missy!" exclaimed the impenitent cook; "do you s'pose I'se goin' to let that old turkey hen stan' between me and my bressed Lawd?"—Exchange.

PIANOS! PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Gems of Thought.

SCIENCE has nothing whatever to do with Christ.—Darwin.

PESSIMISM is sympathy. Optimism is selfishness.—Grant Allen.

HEROISM is not in the deed but in the purpose that lies back of it.—Unity.

THE fanatics begin with humility and kindness, and have all ended with pride and carnage.—Voltaire.

GREAT works of art teach us to abide by our spontaneous impression with good-natured inflexibility, the more when the whole cry of voices is on the other side.—R. W. Emerson.

IN all but religion, men know their true interests and use their own understandings. Nobody takes anything on trust at market; nor would anybody do so at church if there were but a hundredth part the care for truth which there is for money.—W. J. Fox.

AFTER men's attempts to realize their ideals, and reform society without reforming themselves, have ended in disaster, and, sobered by suffering, they submit themselves afresh to the hard discipline which has brought us thus far, further progress may be made.—Herbert Spencer.

THE world is what we see it, abounding in misery and wickedness. If you believe in a moral governor, you are bound to put extraordinary limitations upon his power to vindicate his benevolence, or to limit his benevolence in order to vindicate his power; and, in either case, you can take away with the one hand that safeguard to morality which you give with the other.—Leslie Stephen.

NO attack on free thought or free printing, open and aboveboard, could now be made without very serious and general resistance. This recent oppression has, if you will allow me the expression, sneaked back; it has subtly complicated itself with the moral feeling of the community; it has hid its horns under a white cowl of purity; it has masked itself as a defender of virtue and suppressor of vice. By so doing oppression of thought confesses that it cannot otherwise succeed even in seizing here and there an exceptional victim.—Moncure D. Conway.

PHILADELPHIA has her shame. She has denied a Socialist the freedom of her citizenship. She has imprisoned another Socialist for freedom of speech. I am not a Socialist, but I love freedom. I am not a Socialist, but I do not see that I hold privileges that I may use against Socialism. The same spirit which would spare me the Socialist's blow should spare him mine. America claims to have open doors. But many of her doors are not only not open but are double-barred and protected with armories within. Take down the flag. Hide the stars. Wait till the new heavens set these stars in a background of honor.—Horace L. Traubel.

THERE is, perhaps, no civilized country in the world wherein the native, original man, the real critter, as Whitman loved to say, that underlies all our culture and conventions, crops out so little in manners, in literature, and in social usages. The fear of being unconventional is greater with us than the fear of death. A certain evasiveness, polish, distrust of ourselves, amounting to insipidity and insincerity, is spoken of by observant foreigners. In other words, we are perhaps the least like children of any people in the world. In due time youth and manhood meet; the greatest men are the most frank and simple; but, as a people, we have a long way yet to travel to reach this blessed state.—John Burroughs.

DOWN till the year 1736 it was quite legal for the clergy to make small bells in this country and burn women into oinders in them. There is no vestige of proof that the devil ever burnt a human being in his life; but there is a perfect plethora of black and damning proof that the church has burnt to death millions of human beings with every accompaniment of cruelty, with every circumstance of agony. Unbiased students of ecclesiasticism know well that the real devil of history is the church. This church gave us hell upon earth, and invented for us an everlasting hell when we had done with earth and time. And all this to make us subservient and ignorant enough to support, without a murmur, sacerdotal pomp and tyranny.—Saladin, in "Bottomless Pit."

THIS treatment of Walt Whitman by the stiff Puritan squireocracy of Boston is only one of a long list of similar persecutions in that city. When Kossuth came to Boston almost the only influential citizen who recognized him was Josiah Quincy; many of the whaleboned and camphorated respectabilities ordered their curtains drawn when the hero passed in the street, and would not allow their families to go to the window; Theodore Parker was treated as an outcast or a leper by Boston "society"; nobody "knew" Garrison; Wendell Phillips was ostracized; Charles Sumner avoided, dropped from visiting lists, out on the streets; Dr. Samuel G. Howe, founder of the Asylum for the Blind, and hero of the Greek war for independence, said once, after twenty years' residence in Boston, that he had never been invited to a civic festival by the city authorities; Emerson was shunned; Channing treated with dislike and suspicion.—Wm. Sloane Kennedy.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominations. Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

As the cruiser Chicago is going out of commission, her crew will be transferred to Norfolk to man the monitor Amphitrite. The latter vessel has been twenty-five years in building. John Roach built the hull and the government has at last completed the work.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK raided Trinity Baptist church in this city the other day and arrested the organist on the charge of circulating a pamphlet written by the pastor of the church in which charges were made against the character of another minister. The pamphlet is alleged to be obscene.

GEN. MARTINEZ CAMPOS will be sent to Cuba by the Spanish government to assume command of the forces engaged in the work of suppressing the rebellion in "The Ever-Faithful Isle." Many thousands of fresh troops will accompany him, for the insurrection is now admitted to be very serious.

THE emperor of Japan has ordered an armistice without conditions, pending the progress of peace negotiations with China's envoy. The attack on the latter by a patriotic fanatic secured for China what Li Hung Chang's negotiations had not given her. The assailant of the Chinese envoy has been sentenced to penal servitude for life.

MANY historic buildings were destroyed by fire in St. Augustine, Fla., on March 28. Nine years ago the city was visited by a conflagration that swept away the old cathedral and other venerable buildings. At this rate there will soon be very little left of the Spanish city which disputes with Santa Fé the honor of being the oldest town in North America.

THE first year of the Massachusetts Cremation Society was a successful one. The receipts were $11,088.79 and the expenditures were $10,453.40, of which more than $7,000 was expended in the purchase of machinery, in building, and in laying out the grounds. There were 87 cremations during the year, said to be more than in the first year's work of any crematory in America or Europe, with the exception of that at San Francisco.

THE House of Magnates of Hungary passed the Religious Freedom bill to a second reading and then, by a vote of 126 to 118, eliminated the clause including within the benefits of the bill persons professing no religious belief. Then the rest of the bill was passed, including the clause which authorizes the recognition of all religious sects not inimical to the public interests. The lower house will restore the stricken clause and send the bill back. No doubt the bigoted majority in the House of Magnates have the hearty sympathy of our theocrats.

THE Christian Endeavorers meet in Boston from July 10 to 15, inclusive. Fifty thousand delegates are expected, and a monstrous open-air demonstration will be held on the Common. Governor Greenhalge is to be one of the speakers. Dr. S. F. Smith will read his ode, "America," and then it will be sung by a chorus of 2,000 young people, assisted by the delegates and an immense orchestra. Helen M. Gould contributes for the use of the delegates 50,000 illuminated cards containing the hymn "America," elaborately gotten up in colors at an expense of several thousand dollars.

THE New York legislature has created a corporation to be known as the "Trustees of Scenic and Historic Places and Objects," the work of which "shall be to acquire by purchase, gift, grant, devise, or bequest historic objects or memorable or picturesque places in the state; hold real and personal property in fee or upon such trusts as may be agreed upon between the donors thereof and the corporation; and to improve the same; admission to which shall be free to the public under such rules for the proper protection thereof as the corporation may prescribe, and which property shall be exempt from taxation," and shall not exceed $1,000,000 in value.

IN New York on March 28 it was unusually cold, while in the Southwest it was unseasonably hot. Here are some of the exceptional temperatures for that day: 78 degrees at Nashville and Knoxville, Tenn.; 82 degrees at Palestine and San Antonio, Tex., and also at Vicksburg; 80 degrees at Cairo, Ill.; 84 degrees at Omaha and Valentine, Neb.; 86 degrees at Springfield, Mo., at Fort Smith, Ark., and Memphis, Tenn.; 88 degrees at Kansas City, Mo.; 90 degrees at Dodge City, Kan., and 94 degrees at Concordia, Kan. From March 17 to 22, 1894, a similar hot wave swept over the trans-Mississippi region. According to the New York Herald these were among the highest of the government Weather Bureau readings at that time: 92 degrees at Abilene, Tex.; 95 at Yuma, Ariz.; 89 at Raleigh, N. C., and 88 at Norfolk, Va., Augusta and Savannah, Ga. March 22, 1894, was the warmest day of that date ever recorded by the Weather Bureau in the Middle South Atlantic states from Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey to South Carolina and in Northern Georgia, Northern Alabama and East Tennessee, and among the highest official temperatures of that March were 84 degrees at St. Louis, Fort Smith, Ark., Omaha, Neb., and Dodge City, Kan.; 86 at Concordia, Kan.; 80 at Memphis Tenn.; 93 at San Antonio, Tex.; 82 at Cincinnati, Ohio, and Springfield, Mo.

Desirable Real Estate

FOR SALE

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes' walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes' walk. The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

(1000 STANZAS)

A Poem of Justice and of Liberty.

By J. L. TREUTHART, B.L.

Gathering the ethical or moral elements from Greek mythology, and applying the test of the Golden Rule to the world's history, the author has demonstrated that the liberty and life of the nation depend upon a recognition of the principle that

The poem is in ten Cantos (100 stanzas [to each canto], as follows:

- I.—Themis Enlists the Muses to Battle for the Right.
- II.—The Olympian Council.
- III.—The Goddesses in Consultation.
- IV.—Phebus, Apollo, and Liberty. A Romance in High Life.
- V.—Sketch of World's History to 19th Century.
- VI.—History of the United States. Twofold Sectionalism.
- VII.—The Theory and Nature of Coercion. The Fratricidal War.
- VIII.—Reconstruction and Subsequent Politics. A Satire.
- IX.—The Columbian Exposition.
- X.—The Parliament of Religions and Its Sublime Lessons.

FREETHINKER (to CHRISTIAN PILGRIMS): "Stop! Don't drink that nasty stagnant stuff—here is something sweet and pure!"

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

An Iniquitous Association.

We recently reported a remark of Governor Greenhalge, of Massachusetts, who said in a Sabatarian convention that "Christianity is a part of the government of the commonwealth of Massachusetts." The Boston Traveller says: "He probably meant that the government of the state is a part of Christianity. The whole is always greater than any part, and Christianity must be bigger than Massachusetts." The paper is as badly confused as the governor. It is certainly true that the whole is greater than any one of its parts, but it by no means follows that any given thing which is smaller than another given thing is a part of the larger thing. For instance, a cat is smaller than a cow, but we do not think that even the Traveller would argue that therefore the cat is a part of the cow. Neither could Governor Greenhalge successfully maintain the thesis that the cow is a part of the cat. What seems to have escaped the observation of both the editor and the politician is that unlike things cannot be compared. Leaving to one side all consideration of the question as to which is the larger, Massachusetts or Christianity, it is sufficient to say that neither is a part of the other, for the adequate reason that they are totally dissimilar in their principles and functions. It is readily admitted, however, that there has long been and still is an unnatural liaison between the two, and it is time that it ceased, but Governor Greenhalge seems anxious for a sort of morganatic or left-handed marriage to be consummated between them so as to give to the church a little quasi-respectability in her old age. But the theocrats, with whom the governor is just now chumming, will be content with nothing less than the complete ecclesiastical and civil marriage of the culprits, that their previous consorting may be legalized and she be put into a position to come into possession of all the effects of the state when the latter dies, stricken down by the poisoned wine of the bridal cup.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses or to one, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

The Rationalistic Critics of Paine.

The Portland Oregonian, in an article on science, religion, and the Higher Criticism, declares that Thomas Paine "is a figure of no importance in the history of religion, of science, or of the human intellect." (We quote from the summary of the Oregonian's article which we find in Public Opinion of this city.) Before proceeding to examine the reasons which the critic gives for the conclusion he has reached, we will reproduce one of his assertions regarding Paine and his work:

"Paine was an unbeliever of the type of Voltaire, who assailed theological dogma upon instinct and made war upon the cherished beliefs of mankind, not only without offering it anything better, but without supporting his indictment of theology by citation of established and unquestioned laws of the physical world, and laws no less sure and unchangeable of the human intellect."

This is merely a rationalistic echo of the familiar orthodox estimate of the services of Paine and Voltaire, and is exceedingly superficial and inadequate. We are not to measure the work of those men by the standards of to-day, which owe their acceptance largely to the pioneer struggles of the early Freethinkers, foremost among whom were the two named, but by their surroundings and the necessities of the world at that time. The mace and the battle axe were in order then, no less than the Damascus blade, and right well all three were wielded by Thomas Paine and the Sage of Ferney. It is hypercriticism of the most attenuated kind to aver that these champions of the right to think and speak offered nothing better than that which they sought to overthrow, and to the weakening of which their heroic labors so powerfully contributed. They did offer something better—they offered open-eyed investigation in place of blind acceptance; they offered freedom of thought and expression in place of atrophied brains and sealed lips; they offered the opportunity for men and women to develop into symmetrical manhood and womanhood instead of remaining forever the cringing, robbed, and tortured slaves of priest and king. It is too late in the day for even bloodless modern rationalism to deny to them their well-won niches in the temple of fame and their places in the succession of the apostles of man's redemption from the chains of ignorance. Swinburne says that "Voltaire's great work was to have done more than any other man on record to make the instinct of cruelty not only detestable but ludicrous;" Macaulay observes: "Of all the intellectual weapons which have ever been wielded by man, the most terrible was the mockery of Voltaire. Bigots and tyrants, who had never been moved by the wailing and cursing of millions, turned pale at his name," and Lamartine remarks: "If we judge of men by what they have done, then Voltaire is incontestably the greatest writer of modern Europe. . . . His pen aroused a sleeping world, and shook a far mightier empire than that of Charlemagne—the European empire of a theocracy."

The Oregonian apprehends quite clearly the forces that now make for freedom in the realm of religion. "Rational interpretation of the scriptures and modern questioning of the veracity of theological dogma rest upon the results of three separate but kindred evolutions of human knowledge." These are the physical sciences, notably geology and biology, and philology and historical criticism, "which find the record of human history and achievement in the imperishable traces of primitive language, and place ancient documents and written tradition on trial with the evidence of their own internal structure and comparative relations." It is pointed out that all these sciences were either in their infancy in the time of Paine or had not been born. All this is true, but it by no means follows, as asserted by the Oregon paper, that Paine "is a figure of no importance" in the history of religion and the human intellect. As we have before shown, he did much, very much, to prepare the way for the scholarly critics of to-day who affect to despise him because of his alleged "coarseness and flippancy." But is this all that can be claimed for the author of the "Age of Reason"? Is it a fact that all he did—great as was that service—was to help create an atmosphere of liberty in which his successors could work without danger of strangulation? Is it true that his criticisms of the Bible were so different in their methods and results from those of the investigators of this age who have the advantage of working with the tools of physical science and philology and historical criticism, as well as those of common sense, that his reasonings and conclusions are valueless, and his works incapable of harm to orthodox theology? Unfortunately for the Oregonian's position, orthodox writers are not all prepared to dismiss Paine with the sneer which that journal seems to think disposes of him for good. In our issue of March 30th we noticed in the column of "Freethought Progress" two articles which appeared in the United Presbyterian Magazine under the title of "A Forgotten Higher Critic of Last Century." These articles were written by Dr. Thomas Whitelaw, of Kilmarnock, and in them he gives extracts from the writings of an author of the last century whose conclusions he finds to be similar to those of the advanced critics of our time. Near the end of the second article he discloses the identity of the author, who proves to be Thomas Paine, and the book from which the excerpts were taken is the "Age of Reason." Truth, a non-sectarian paper of New York, tells this anecdote, the scene being a Baptist congress recently held in Detroit:

"President Harper and President Andrews of Brown University, with others, had been advocating the methods of modern Higher Criticism, and saying that the last twenty-seven chapters of Isaiah were written by some other man, when Prof. Howard Osgood, of Rochester, arose to reply. He spoke briefly, completely answered the Higher Critics, and then said: 'I have here an article, written almost exactly one hundred years ago. I will read it, and then tell you the name of the author.' He read a criticism on the Bible and especially on Isaiah, advocating a double authorship of the latter, in almost exactly the language of Harper and his friends. He made a few comments upon the clearness of the ideas of the author, and showed his teachings to be identical with modern Higher Criticism. He then exclaimed after a long pause, 'The author of this paper was Thomas Paine.' The effect was wonderful. There was a look of surprise on the faces of the critics, and then, as the applause rang out, they looked as though they would like to escape."

These two instances of the identification of Paine with the Higher Critics may furnish the northwestern disparager of that author a little food for serious thought. Now we must take note of another blunder of the Oregonian's, this time a most glaring contradiction. It speaks of religion as "an abiding and necessary force in the world," and declares that Christianity, "though subject to evolutionary changes, and not the same thing, therefore, from age to age, has been the highest form or expression of religion these many centuries, and probably will be during many centuries more." The writer adds that "the world could not do without it," but it will pass on, through Christianity, to other expressions of religious feeling, thought, and fervor, which Christianity will profoundly affect and largely control. "This is what Paine and men like him have never seen. Rational thought is hardly affected at all by their superficialities." Whose superficiality is shown by this is easily seen. "Paine and men like him" have realized that Christianity is subject to change, and this fact was one of the evidences that convinced them that it was purely human in origin and development. They have also perceived that it would for a long time yet influence the religious thought of the world, chiefly because the religious thought of the world is the least advanced thought of the world, and hence the more highly educated the people become and the more logically they are able to think the further they will get away from the primitive and only genuine conception of Christianity. Of course it is only a form of polite misrepresentation to call the religion of the Higher Critics Christianity. It is no such thing, and this is where the editor of the Oregonian contradicts himself when he says that Christianity is still the "highest expression of religion" and "probably will be during many centuries more." So far as he is concerned, Christianity is non-existent. He has swept away its every foundation stone. Hear what he has said about it and the Bible upon which it rests in paragraphs preceding the one containing the before-quoted sneer at the "superficialities" of Paine:

"The advance of physical sciences, notably geology and biology, has wholly upset the cosmogony and anthropology of the Bible, discovering the absurdity of all its teachings as to the creation of the world and the origin of man. . . . Geology was in its infancy, and the theological myth of creation held its ground against the abstract reasoning of rational probability. Lamarck laid the foundation of the science of biology in the time of Paine, but the world waited fifty years for Darwin to demonstrate it and prove the scriptural account of the origin of man a beautiful myth." A little further along he says that during the last half century "theological dogma has been rationally assailed and successfully overthrown." Such being the case, what is left of Christianity? Nothing but the mundane morality that it appropriated from the common store of the race. But that does not give it a name or a local habitation. It has trampled under foot all the ethical obligations in its desperate endeavor to force the nations to accept as heaven-sent the theological fictions that had their source in the "myth of creation" which its educated defenders now relegate to the realm of legend. So far as these cultivated apologists are concerned, Christianity is simply a "civilized heathenism," which is in no sense entitled to the name of Christianity.

A National Reform (God-in-the-Constitution) Institute has just been held at Butler, Pa. Professor Dill conducted blackboard work every evening except that of Saturday, of the first week of April, and union meetings were held Sunday, March 31st, and Sunday, April 7th. Lectures were delivered by leading theocrats. Do Freethinkers realize how deadly in earnest these foes of the civil republic are?

A secular newspaper advises the members of the state legislature to read and ponder this sentiment from Thomas Paine's "Rights of Man": "Public money ought to be touched with the most scrupulous consciousness of honor. It is not the produce of riches only, but of the hard earnings of labor and poverty." No man will make a presumptively safe state legislator or congressman who is not thoroughly familiar with Paine's "Rights of Man" and Spencer's writings on sociology and the state. We should not be in the least danger from theocratic machinations if all our law-makers and a strong minority of the people were thus equipped.

It will be recalled that some months ago Rev. J. C. Campbell, of Los Angeles, was sued by Miss Tessa L. Kelso, librarian of the Public Library of that city, for having prayed that she would be cleansed of all her sin and made a woman worthy of her office. When the suit came to trial Mr. Campbell demurred to the information, taking the ground that his statement was privileged. Judge Clark overruled the demurrer, telling the reverend calumniator that a slander could be perpetrated in a prayer as readily as in any other form of speech. If the ruling of Judge Clark is sustained, what is to become of the revivalists and the other meddling preachers who have always acted on the presumption that their pulpit denunciations of their congregations and of citizens generally were privileged?

"In the Bible Sabbath desecration is placed along side of murder, theft, lying, adultery, and blasphemy."—Rev. J. A. Marquis.

Which simply shows how little the Bible writers knew. But note, please, that Mr. Marquis classes murder and "blasphemy" together as capital crimes. Which simply shows how little he knows.

Rev. Father Cleary, of Minneapolis, asked if the Catholic religion could and would exist under this government, made a long reply, the gist of which is contained in these few words: "The Catholic church flourishes best where man enjoys the greatest possible liberty." Unfortunately, then, the church has ever been blind to her own interests, for she has always acted as though she was certain that she would die at once if men were to become possessed of even the slightest amount of liberty in matters of religion and morals. Has she been trying to commit suicide during all the centuries that men have thought she was striving solely to banish liberty from the earth?

How hard the old superstitions die! Here are the Christian Scientists, who have been persecuted enough to teach them sense, if persecution could have that effect, trying to make the people believe that Mrs. Eddy is a manifestation of the feminine deity. A newspaper states that the pastor of a Christian Science congregation in New York has made this claim for Mrs. Eddy, and also that there is in Boston a church of that cult having stained glass windows containing portraits of the lady with a halo and representing her in conversation with God. Are we to have an "only begotten daughter" at this late day? Perhaps some of our "new heaven and new earth" friends can tell us about it.

If you send us fifty cents for a trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months, you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you put into the hands of your friend, or of some acquaintance, the means whereby he or she may be led to become an interested watcher and active promoter of the intellectual and ethical development of the people. There is no knowing how much good such a trial subscription may do; many a time a sample copy alone has enlisted a zealous soldier in the army of peaceful progress. If you can afford to fill that subscription blank which you will find on page 226 with names of trial subscribers, or can get that many men to give you fifty cents each for that purpose, so much the better.

In the course of an able editorial on the bill now pending in Parliament for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales, the Evening Post of this city says: "But it is vain to expect disestablishment as yet. The accredited spokesmen of the church will prove again their title to the love of the people by voting against the Welsh bill, just as they voted against the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, against the reform of the penal code, the reform of Parliament, Catholic emancipation, the civil liberty of dissenters, and almost every other measure which marks the political and moral progress of the century." This is certainly not flattering to the English church, but the explanation is quickly found—it is the truth.

Referring to some of Colonel Ingersoll's observations on the Bible story of Elijah and Elisha, the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier remarks:

"Colonel Ingersoll can only understand a prophet like himself, who follows prophesying for the profit that is in it, and caters to human opposition to religious restraint to make that profit more sure and great."

The Freethought Letter-Writing Corps, in noticing this, will pay particular attention to the remark about "human opposition to religious restraint"; show that religion is concerned first to restrain freedom of investigation, and that belief has always, until very recently (and is even now with most religionists), been held to be the primary and one indispensable virtue. All crimes may be forgiven, but the theological offense of blasphemy against the holy ghost merits and will receive the punishment of eternal torture. This affords a good opportunity to make a courteous statement of the fundamental principles of Freethought as contrasted with the dogmas and history of the church.

"The law of one day in seven, which God stamped on man when he created him, cannot be violated without evil consequences"—Rev. J. A. Marquis.

Please prove your major premise. Did "God" stamp a seventh-day Sabbath on man? If so, how comes it that tribes in different parts of the world have four-day weeks and five-day weeks and six-day weeks and ten-day weeks? How comes it that the Jews, as nearly as we can judge by the Bible, while they had a monthly moon festival or day of rest from time immemorial, did not have a weekly Sabbath until after the return of those who had been in captivity among the Babylonians? Why does Mr. Marquis utterly ignore the natural origin of the week in the phases of the moon? Does he wish us to believe that he is ignorant of these facts or does he not care what intelligent men and women think concerning his mental honesty?

The Boston Traveller remarks:

"There is said to be a law in this state making it an offense to give away an object or thing as an inducement to purchase other things; for example, to give away a picture with every certain amount of other things purchased. There was once a law which made it an offense for a man to kiss his wife on Sunday, but was strangely silent about kissing some other man's wife. Many a man still living can remember when it was not permissible to open the theaters in Boston on Saturday evenings, and there was a law to punish any dissipated individual found smoking on the street. Some of these fantastic old legal freaks have been done away with, but there are some communities which, like some individuals, require an unconscionable time to get wide awake."

Yes, all that is true, and, unfortunately, it is also true that during the last thirty years we have put twenty "fantastic new legal freaks" on the statute books for every "fantastic old legal freak" that we have taken off, and the insane work has apparently only just begun.

The Sundayites of York, Pa., sent a telegram to the Pennsylvania legislature warning that body that "three hundred and fifty Christian Endeavorers of [the] First Presbyterian Church, York, protest against the enactment of laws permitting Sabbath desecration. Psalms xciv, 20." The proposed law that the Sabbatarians were fulminating against was one to permit the publication and sale of papers on Sunday, so they hurled at the heads of the Senators this Bible text: "Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law?" We do not quite see the applicability of the text, for the interrogative form seems to suggest that the "throne of iniquity" will not have fellowship with those who frame "mischief by a law." Messrs. Theocrats, you had better be careful how you handle that two-edged sword, the Bible; it takes a very skilful fencer to wield it without cutting himself worse than he does his antagonist. Besides, you have no business to threaten American law-makers with the vengeance of any foreign power, malign or beneficent.

Col. John A. Cockerill, correspondent in Japan of the New York Herald, says in one of his descriptive letters from Tokio to that paper:

"But incongruities must be looked for here. The incandescent light swings in front of the moldy Buddhist temple; the flare-covered bull is led in barbaric procession past gaudy modern shops; the tram-car driver hoots the half-naked coolie in his primitive cart in the streets of the capital, and telegraph wires enter the sacred precincts of a monarch who holds that he is of divine origin. On all hands feudal stupidity jostles modern methods and ideas."

We all know how it is, for the same state of affairs prevails in this country. Incandescent and arc lights swing in front of Christian temples whose creeds are as moldy as the walls of the Buddhist temples of Japan, and telegraph wires run into Covenanter convention halls where men are met to plot for the overthrow of the republic and the establishment of an empire whose mikado is to be a god said to have been murdered in Palestine some two thousand years ago, and who was so ignorant that he believed in demoniacal possession and did not know the shape of the earth which he, as a third part of the creator, had made. Yes, "on all hands feudal stupidity jostles modern methods and ideas." We thank you, Colonel Cockerill, for the aptly descriptive expression.

The Portland (Me.) Sunday Telegram is somewhat anxious concerning the possible outcome of the revival in progress in that city. It says that "the last great religious awakening" which occurred in Portland "was followed by the discovery of a shortage of nearly a quarter of a million of dollars in the accounts of Cashier Gould, who had been largely instrumental in bringing Mr. Moody to awaken people to a realizing sense of their spiritual shortcomings," and this lapse was "speedily followed by that of another equally good man who, like himself, enjoyed the confidence of churchmen and bank directors." The Telegram is slightly assured by the fact that in the present instance the defalcations began before the inauguration of the revival under the direction of Mr. Mills, two "truly good men" having been discovered and taken their departure for pastures new.

Some years ago the Supreme Court of the United States asserted in an obiter dictum that "this is a Christian nation." Since that time the court has had a very warm place in the affections of the Sabbatharians and other theocrats. They never tire of quoting the "decision" and praising the court for its "far-sighted statesmanship." But they must have felt queer when they got up last Monday morning and read in the papers of that date (printed on Sunday) that this same ideal Supreme Court had held a session on "the Sabbath" for the purpose of considering the income tax suits. Such "profanation" of the Sabbath by the Supreme Court is a very rare occurrence, but that fact will not make the sting of the present horrible desecration any the less sharp and irritating. What Dr. Stevenson, Dr. McAllister, the two Rev. Mr. Georges, and Governor Greenhalge will do about it we are not at present advised. They may try impeachment proceedings in the next Congress. We extend to them our heartfelt commiseration; it is too bad to have one's idols behave in such a scandalous manner.

The Superior (Wis.) Leader admits that the present exemption of church property is a relic of the former union of church and state, but it thinks that "those who are so vigorously opposed to any vestige of that union as to want to tax the mortgaged edifice of a poor church society are altogether too particular on that point." Does the Leader know of any good reason why the mortgaged church of the poor congregation should be exempt while the mortgaged homes of its poor members and of other poor people are taxed? The paper quoted from says that logically, "the next step would be to make the poor preacher pay an annual license for the privilege of preaching in the church building." Well, will you tell us why, if other professional men and those engaged in business are compelled to pay a license tax, the clergymen should be exempt from that tax? On what principle would you grant him special favors? He receives pay for performing the marriage ceremony, and the couple he marries pay for a license as well—where would be the injustice in compelling him to pay for a license? Is he of a higher order of creation, to be borne free on the shoulders of those beneath him? The poor teamster who moves his household goods has to take out and pay for a license—why should not the preacher be required to do the same? If such a tax is equitable in the one case it is equitable in both.

In the Methodist Conference in Salem, Mass., on April 7, Rev. Dr. Lansing made a speech in which he accused President Cleveland of intemperance. In a subsequent interview he reiterated his offensive remarks. The president has unwisely chosen to give the fellow notoriety by noticing his charge. In an interview he says:

"This is simply an outrage. Though it is not the first time a thing of this kind has been attempted, I cannot avoid a feeling of indignation that any man who makes any claim to decency, and especially any one who assumes the rôle of a Christian minister, should permit himself to become a disseminator of wholesale lies and calumnies not less stupid than they are cruel and wicked."

We should suppose that President Cleveland would have known the nature of the genus clergyman better than to be surprised at the dissemination of "wholesale lies and calumnies" by one of them. Of course he is a good Presbyterian himself, but this should not wholly blind him to plain facts. Does he not know, for instance, that thousands and thousands of ministers have given themselves to the circulation of "wholesale lies and calumnies not less stupid than they are cruel and wicked" about Thomas Paine and Voltaire? Does he not know how they defame living Infidels and radical reformers? Did he never hear of Rev. A. C. Dixon's outrageous assaults upon Colonel Ingersoll? The president remarks that he is glad "for the sake of the Christian religion that these scandal-mongering ministers are few." But they are not few; why the president thinks they are is because not many of them have openly attacked him. When a representative of the press asked the Rev. Mr. Lansing for his authorities for the statement he had made regarding the president he drew himself up into Puritanic rigidity and loftily answered: "I never talk with reporters on Sunday." As the World remarks, this is sickening cant. It is all right, it seems, to make grave charges against a man on Sunday, but when it comes to giving the authority for the accusation it is discovered to be wicked to discuss secular affairs on the Sabbath. A very convenient dodge, indeed. Now Mr. Lansing has "apologized" for his statement at Salem in a letter to the papers which is more insulting than the original slander.

How the Sunday-Sabbatarians do squirm to get out of the dilemma in which they are placed by the Bible and the Saturday-Sabbatarians! A correspondent of the Christian Statesman writes to that theocratic sheet: "If you can refer us to anything in the Bible for Sunday as strong as the Fourth commandment is for Saturday, I would be pleased to see it." Whereupon the editor replies:

"The Fourth commandment is 'strong' for neither Saturday nor Sunday. It is strong for 'the Sabbath of the Lord thy God.' The institution for rest and worship of one day in seven or the seventh day is that for which the Fourth commandment has its place in the Decalogue. A mere day cannot be a sign between God and his people. The institution of the Sabbath, a day religiously kept and honored as a day of rest and worship, is such a sign."

If it is true—which it is not—that the Bible does not particularize the day that is to be kept as the Sabbath, by what authority do the Sabbatharians presume to dictate to the people what day they shall observe? If God has not specified the day to be observed, why should they? Are they wiser and more punctilious than their God? If a day "religiously kept and honored" is the sign between "God and his people," why are there Adventists in the jails of Tennessee and Arkansas because they have "religiously kept and honored" Saturday instead of Sunday? They have kept and honored "a" day, and that is all that is required, according to the Statesman itself. The editor concludes his answer with these words:

"The law of the Sabbath as embodied in the Fourth commandment and in man's nature is immutable law for man because it is universally and perpetually the same for all men in every part of the world."

No doubt, then, the editor of the Statesman and his associates in the Sabbatarian work would not in the least object if the Adventists, having become a majority in some state, Pennsylvania, for instance, should proceed to enact precisely the same laws to enforce the observance of Saturday as the Sabbath that the theocrats are now trying to enact to compel the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath! It could not possibly make any difference to them, according to Dr. McAllister's argument, for he distinctly says that the Fourth commandment does not prescribe the day but merely the institution and that "a day religiously kept and honored as a day of rest and worship" is the essential thing. We are of the opinion that by the time our Adventist brethren get done with Dr. McAllister he will heartily wish he had made some other answer to his correspondent.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS)

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer for one month: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

PREPARED BUT NOT DELIVERED.

Address of Adolph Bierck, Esq., to the Legislative Committee.

IN BEHALF OF THE UNCHURCHED MULTITUDE

"The Truth Seeker's" Attorney, Who Was Not Granted the Promised Hearing, Presents
His Compliments and His Written Argument for Repeal of Sunday Laws to the Committee to Whom the Petition Was Referred.

NEW YORK, April 2, 1895.

HON. LAMBERT B. KERN, Chairman of Excise Committee, Assembly Chamber, Albany, N. Y., Dear Sir: At a recent meeting of the Excise Committee, at which a public hearing was held upon the bills relative to a more liberal legislative enactment regarding the liquor trade, I had the honor to attend as the representative of the New York TRUTH SEEKER and of the great mass which is unattached to any religious sect, in whose behalf I expected to have the pleasure of addressing you. You may, perhaps, recall that we met some time before the hearing, and that I was promised ample opportunity to be heard. I now learn that there will be no further public hearing and that our side of the question will be left without adequate representation.

I cannot censure the committee for determining not to undergo again the ordeal to which it was then subjected by the great array of orthodox talent which formed so large a part of the gathering that crowded the assembly chamber. There was presented to you, on that occasion, such a mass of irrelevant argument that I believe your committee, as well as everyone interested in excise reform, left the chamber with the conviction that the real issue had been most effectually obscured by the interjection into your deliberations of a bitter religious discussion. In anticipation of such a movement, I was selected to brush away the obscuring clouds and to bring back to your consideration the real aspects which the question presents. As lawyers familiar with the principles that underlie the constitutions of our national and state governments, we are well aware that no legislation whatsoever is permissible in the interests of any particular religious sect or agglomeration of religious sects, and it is to this point in particular that I desire to address myself in the memorial which I respectfully beg leave to submit to your consideration and that of your committee. I do not feel that I am at fault in seeking to expose the uselessness and fallacy of the many arguments that were presented before you, because of the exaggeration and arrogant manner in which it was claimed that the particular religious sects represented were entitled to demand legislation from the honorable body of which you are members, to maintain what is purely and simply a religious observance. I have the honor to subscribe myself,

Very respectfully yours, ADOLPH BIERCK, JR.

MR. CHAIRMAN, AND GENTLEMEN OF THE EXCISE COMMITTEE: On behalf of those who are unattached to any sectarian body of men or women bound by the ties of ceremonial religion, I ask your indulgence for a few moments that I may advert to some considerations bearing with the utmost directness upon the subject which has been referred to you by the honorable body of which you are members.

The people on whose behalf I address you are, if we divide our voting population upon the basis of belief or non-belief in a revealed religion, two-thirds of the whole number. A few weeks ago a Christian minister undertook by the study of statistics to ascertain the relative voting strength of the church and unchurched elements, and such was the result of his investigation; and I believe that on the part of the unattached, if I may use the word, nothing fairer can be done than to accept his figures.

NOT A QUESTION OF RELIGION.

There is a growing attempt, not only by those who frame laws in legislatures, but also by those who are responsible for what is termed judicial legislation, to inject into our political consciousness the element of religious conscience, which, we hardly need point out, is a fruitful source of discord. I do not come here to talk against any creed, any sect, or any religion. Nor do I come here to urge upon you the recommendation of any legislation in support of any particular group of notions concerning theology or religion; for were you, gentlemen, to permit a discussion of the question before you upon such a basis, you might have arguments poured in upon you gleaned from all the authorities from St. Thomas Aquinas to Dr. McGlynn, from Plato to Henry George, from Moses to Felix Adler, from Socrates to Herbert Spencer, from Galileo to Huxley, from Martin Luther to Colonel Ingersoll, and from John Knox to Dr. Parkhurst; and if life were spared to enough of you gentlemen to vote, it is beyond doubt that there would be a minority report.

The question before you is not one of religion or of irreligion. You have no more right to recommend to the legislature a bill in favor of opening the saloons on Sunday for the benefit of the orthodox than you have to recommend a bill in favor of closing them for the benefit of the heathens, Infidels, Liberals, Jews, Seventh-Day Adventists and Baptists, or by whatever name you choose to call the great mass of the unattached. And right here let me say that nine out of ten of our orthodox friends will tell you that they do not urge Sabbath legislation for themselves, but for the unsaved. Their people are secure; church ordinance is enough for them; it is the great mass outside the fold whom they want to reach. That is, the minority want to legislate for the great majority. But should our orthodox friends say it is not for the unbelievers alone that they want Sabbath laws, but also to keep their own adherents in line, then I say that you are asked to legislate for the benefit of a particular religious establishment, and that the bill of rights and the constitution of the state of New York forbid you to do it. The moment a religion calls upon the state to enforce its dogmas or aid its propaganda it confesses that it has abandoned the sanctions of conscience to seek the support of human law. It has forsworn conviction and kissed the hand of tyranny.

THE FIRST DEAL BETWEEN CHURCH AND STATE.

When Christianity was planted in Rome the imperial constitution prescribed a religion of polytheism as the state religion. The different nationalities in the provinces were permitted to retain their own forms of worship, but the law required that they should recognize the emperor as the head of all religions by virtue of his office as Pontifex Maximus, and it required not only that they should do homage to the living Cæsar, but they must worship the images of the dead ones. The Christians, recognizing only one god, refused to do this. They broke the law of the state, and under that constitution the early Christian persecutions were but legal prosecutions. But state persecution for opinion's sake only fed the flame that lit the way for highest talent and independent thought to rally round the standard of the new faith. By the time of Constantine the Christian church had absorbed within its ranks all that was best to upbuild the state, and he found that if he could not stamp it out he might make it his tool. Remember, he was a pagan and a murderer. An opportune miracle, a vision, wherein he saw the cross upon the arching skies, converted him. He acknowledged his conversion, or asserted it, and the Christian clergy recognized him as emperor by the grace of God upon the same principle of legitimacy that the church had developed in its own autonomy, and he in return gave to the Christian clergy jurisdiction over all questions of social organization.

Such were the terms of the first deal between church and state. Mark the results: From the time of the disruption of the Roman empire, after the death of Charles the Great, science, literature, and the arts were buried in the tenebræ of the dark ages. Not merely was it a period of retrogression from the civilization of the Roman emperors, but it was a period of the obliteration of all that the genius and the inquiring mind of man had developed from the era of the culmination of the civilization of Egypt to the golden age of Augustus. We are told that the spark of progress was kept alive by the monks and ecclesiastics, but it was never permitted to kindle into a flame which might shed its light upon the world. The blood spilt in the holy wars, the countless tortures and persecutions in the name of religion, the dense ignorance and fanaticism which made such things possible, were all the legitimate outcome of the domination of the state by the church. Shakspeare tells us that the evil men do live after them, and that the good is oft interred with their bones; and so had it been with the ecclesiastics had not the spark they preserved kindled the torch of the Reformation. But the torch-bearers were heretics.

SUNDAY ESTABLISHED.

The first official recognition of the first day was that of Constantine, whose edict, A.D., 321 forbade the performance of all work on Sunday. Next the Theodosian Code prohibited the prosecution of suits and public business on Sunday. Then came the three canons of the church which prohibited, in A.D. 517, 895, 932, the holding of pleas and adjudging of cases on Sunday. Yet the edict of Constantine and the legislation of the church was not universal, for the church literature contains numberless authorities that prove that its observance was riddled with exceptions. Not until the twelfth century was Sunday called the Christian Sabbath, but in 1201, St. Eustace appeared with a parchment purporting to have been written by God in heaven and laid upon the altar of St. Simeon in Jerusalem. Pope Innocent III. gave it the papal sanction. Among other things this divine decree contained the following:

By my right hand, I swear unto you that if you do not observe the Lord's day, I will send unto you the pagan nations that they may slay you. . . . I will open the heavens, and for rain I will rain upon you stones and wood and hot water in the night, that no one may take precautions against the same, and that so I may destroy all wicked men. . . . I will send unto you beasts that have the heads of lions, the hair of women, the tails of camels, and they shall be so ravenous that they shall devour your flesh, and you shall long to flee away and hide yourselves for fear of the beasts.

Christ said: "What man shall there be among you that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the Sabbath day will he not lay hold on it and lift it out. How much, then, is man better than a sheep? Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath days" (Matthew xii, 11, 12).

Who ever asked, except from an ecclesiastic, the right to do wrong on any day? "As regards the Sabbath, or Sunday, there is no necessity of keeping it" (Michelet's Life of Luther, bk. 4, ch. ii). "If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance on a Jewish foundation—then I order you to work on it, to dance on it, to ride on it, to feast on it, to do anything that shall reprove this encroachment on the Christian spirit of liberty" (Luther's Table Talk). To the same effect is Melancthon, the friend and aid of Luther. (Augsburg Confession.)

PURITAN INFLUENCE.

It was the work of the Puritans to crush out from the Sabbath all ideas of public liberty. Even King James, whose translation of the Bible we now use, appreciated the fact that Sunday of necessity must be a day of recreation for the people, and in his "Book of Sports," published in 1618, he set forth such games and amusements as were permissible on Sunday. The Puritans, however, who came to this country for the very purpose of worshipping God after the dictates of their own consciences, without interference from the state, were the very ones to perpetuate in the land of freedom which they peopled the same tyranny against which they had rebelled at home. It was they who procured the enactment of laws making it a misdemeanor to do almost anything on Sunday except walk reverentially to and from church. In the city of Boston an iron cage was kept wherein Sabbath-breakers were confined and exhibited as culprits to the public. In one instance three Quaker women, for some trivial offense, were convicted of Sabbath-breaking, and on a cold December day were tied behind a cart, stripped to the waist, and publicly whipped through the streets of Boston and Roxbury, staining the snow with the drops of blood which fell from their lacerated bodies. The blue laws of the dominion of New Haven contain the following: "No one shall travel, cook victuals, make bread, sweep houses, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath day; no one shall cross a river on Sunday but an authorized clergyman; no one shall kiss his wife, her husband, or child on the Sabbath or on fasting days. The Sabbath day shall commence at sunset on Saturday."

SURVIVING BLUE LAWS.

We of the present day, accustomed to the enjoyment of a broader liberty, hold up our hands in horror at such tyrannical enactments, yet I will show you that there are upon our statute books laws which, under the interpretation placed upon them by our courts, intrench upon the individual liberty of our citizens quite as much. When the constitution of the state of New York was enacted in 1777, the framers thought that they had forever secured to the people of this state absolute and complete freedom of conscience; that they had secured absolute liberty to the votaries of any and all religions, their free exercise without interference of the state. The constitutional enactment is: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state for all mankind, and no person shall be rendered incompetent as a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the state."

The Constitution of the United States forbids its government the establishment of any state religion, and secures within its territories entire freedom for the individual.

It would seem that these provisions were ample protection, that they would be sufficient to secure to the citizen the broadest liberty of conscience, that they forbade, at the very threshold, the idea of an established religion over which could be thrown the mantle of state protection; it would seem that these provisions must forbid all legislative discrimination on behalf of one religion against another; it would seem that these provisions must have secured to the individuals perfect equality before the law in matters which touched the conscience; but what was the interpretation placed upon these provisions by the judiciary?

The great Chancellor Kent, whose name is venerated by every member of the legal profession, in the case of People vs. Ruggles, 8 Johnson, 291, maintained that the Christian religion was the established religion of the state of New York, and that one who, in the exercise of the freedom of speech believed to have been guaranteed him by the constitution, had the temerity of denying the doctrines of the divinity of Christ and the miraculous conception, was guilty of an offense against that religion which was punishable under the laws of the state of New York.

In the case of Lindenmuller vs. the People, 33 Barb., 548, the Supreme Court affirmed and approved the opinion of Chancellor Kent in the case just cited, and reaffirmed that the Christian religion was the established religion of the state of New York, and the court says:

Different denominations of Christians are recognized, but this does not detract from the force of the recognition of God as the only proper object of religious worship, and the Christian religion as the religion of the people, which it was not intended to destroy but to maintain. The public peace and the public welfare are greatly dependent upon the protection of the religion of the country, and the defending and punishing of offenses against it, and acts wantonly committed subversive of it. The Constitution does not secure the same regard to the religion of Mohammed and the Grand Lama as to that of our Savior; the Constitution does not prohibit the courts or legislature from regarding the Christian religion as the religion of the people, as distinguished from the false religions of the world.

Yet the constitution, which is the supreme authority in a court of law, uses the language, "without discrimination or preference." The court then goes on to say: "And further, that if we give every one his natural rights, or what are claimed as natural rights, the list of civil offenses will be confined to those acts which are mala in se, and a man may go naked through the streets, establish houses of prostitution ad libitum, and keep a faro bank on every street corner!" Which offenses the learned judge considers merely mala prohibita, or crimes merely by force of statute.

OTHER BARBARISMS.

What, then, is the position of the Jew in the eye of the law? And incidentally the question rises in my mind, Who pays the taxes on the bulk of the property that lines the chief artery of travel in the city of New York? Were I called upon to institute a search for the lost tribes of Israel, I should go to seek my first clue in Broadway.

And what has the legislature done in order to secure the civil liberty of our citizens? The laws of 1848, 1 R. S., 675, Sec. 70, provided that no one should travel on Sunday unless in the case of charity or necessity, or in going to or from some church or place of worship within a distance of twenty miles, or in going for medical aid or for medicines and returning, or in visiting the sick and returning, or in carrying the mail of the United States, or in going express by order of some public officer, nor should there be any servile labor or working on that day, unless done by persons who kept Saturday as a holy time.

In 1862 the Court of Appeals declared that a contract for the publication of an advertisement in a Sunday paper was void. (Smith vs. Wilcox, 24, N. Y., 353.) And not until nine years afterward did the legislature wipe out this anomaly by permitting the publication of Sunday papers, and the enforcement of contracts in relation to the same. (Laws of 1871, ch. 702.)

In 1866 the Supreme Court of this state held that the owner of a horse and carriage could not recover for its hire if used in illegal traveling on Sunday. The operation of railway trains, street cars, and public conveyances has been a matter the necessity of which it has taken our courts years to decide. In Pennsylvania we have a conviction of a culprit who drove an omnibus on Sunday. In Indiana one who carried pleasure seekers to a picnic was convicted. Later, in Pennsylvania, it took three judges, much argument, and page upon page of opinion, to determine that the operation of railway trains on Sunday was a necessity and ought not to be inhibited; but the court seems to be ashamed of its decision, for it bases it upon the beneficial effects to be derived from the operation of public conveyances on Sunday, particularly to the poorer classes, and on the fact that people use the roads in going to church.

In the case of Carroll against the Staten Island Railroad (58 N. Y., 126), which arose out of the injury done to Carroll by the blowing up, through negligence, of the boiler of the ferryboat Westfield, it was brought out on his cross-examination that he was traveling merely for the purpose of recreation and enjoying the fresh air; that he was not going to church nor coming from it; that he was not going to visit a sick friend nor going for the doctor, nor to buy drugs, but simply for the purpose of enjoying "God's fresh air." Upon these facts the trial court, the Supreme Court, and the Court of Appeals, found that he was a criminal and a law-breaker, and recovery for his injuries was resisted on the ground that his contract with the railroad company was illegal and he himself a violator of the law. The case went to the Court of Appeals, and that court declared that although he was a violator of the law and his contract with the company illegal, yet the carrier owed him the same duty as though he were legally traveling, upon the theory that its obligation to the passenger rests not upon the contract of carriage, but upon the general liability of a carrier.

PALLIATIONS OF INJUSTICE.

But these Sunday statutes have little by little become riddled by exceptions. The conditions of modern life have undergone such changes as to render, even for the most devout, the strict observance of Sunday not merely irksome but impossible.

The provision which exempts Jews, Seventh-Day Adventists, and other persons who hold another day holy and observe it as such, if read in conjunction with the statute, imposes upon the citizen the obligation of observing a religious ceremonial—if he does not hold Sunday as he must hold some other day once each week. It needs no argument to show that such laws affect the conscience and force religious ceremonial of some kind upon the individual, and so abridge or deny that freedom of conscience which we fondly believe is guaranteed us by the law of the land. Freedom of conscience means not merely the right to worship God after our own manner, but it means that in matters of belief and worship the individual shall have complete liberty, and that the only law which shall affect him is that of his own conviction and conscience, and that the only limitation upon this freedom is that, in his religious observance, he shall not offend against the laws of morality or decency. Sic utere tui ut non alienum lædas—that he shall so exercise his own rights as not to injure another—is the fundamental doctrine of all civil liberty.

DUTY OF THE LEGISLATURE.

When we find upon our statute books or in the judge-made laws of our state, provisions which are hostile to and subversive of the principles laid down in the fundamental law of the land, it is the duty of the legislature to repeal those statutes and wipe out those decisions, and to write upon our statute books laws that can be enforced with the consent of a majority of the people and laws that are in accord with the great principles that underlie our constitution.

Nothing new is asked of the legislature when it is urged to expunge the unjust, discriminating, and manifestly unconstitutional Sunday laws. No less an authority than Judge Cooley holds that they are obnoxious to the constitution in so far as they enforce the observance of a second Sabbath. He says: "The Jew who is forced to respect the first day of the week, when his conscience requires of him the observance of the seventh also, may plausibly urge that the law discriminates against his religion, and by forcing him to keep a second Sabbath in each week, unjustly, though by indirection, punishes him for his belief. It appears to us that if the benefit to the individual is alone to be considered, the argument which he may make who has already observed the seventh day of the week, is unanswerable." (Cooley's Const. Lim. 6th Ed., 584; Cinn. vs. Rice, 15 O., 225; Canton vs. Nist, 9 O., St. 439.)

In Ohio Judge Thurman, in upholding the laws which prescribe a day of rest, says (Broom vs. Richards, 2 O., St. 391): "But it is nevertheless true that the power to make the law rests in the legislative control over things temporal and not over things spiritual. We are to regard the statute under consideration as a mere municipal or police regulation whose validity is neither strengthened nor weakened by the fact that the day of rest it enjoins is the Sabbath day. . . . Regarding it merely as an exercise of legislative authority, the act would have had neither more nor less validity had any other day been adopted." (Citing Charleston vs. Benjamin, 2 Strobb., 508; 49 Am. Doc. 608, Specht vs. The Com., 8 Pa., St. 312; 49 Am. Doc. 518; Warner vs. Smith, 8 Conn., 14.)

A CALIFORNIAN DECISION.

The constitution of California contains the same provision as our own. The act of 1858 of that state prohibiting the doing of certain things on Sunday which are lawful on other days is discussed by the Supreme Court of that state in Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal., 502, and the court says that the act of April, 1858, for the better observance of the Sabbath is in conflict with the constitution and therefore void; that the constitution, when it forbids discrimination or preference in religion, does not mean merely to guarantee toleration, but religious liberty in its fullest sense, and a perfect equality without distinction between religious sects; that the enforced observance of a day held sacred by one of these sects is a discrimination in favor of that sect and a violation of the religious freedom of the others. The protection of the constitution extends to every individual or to none; it is the individual that is intended to be protected. Every citizen has the right to vote and worship as he pleases without having his motives impeached in any tribunal of the state. When the citizen is sought to be compelled by the legislature to do any affirmative religious act, or to refrain from doing anything because it violates simply a religious principle or observance, the act is unconstitutional.

In the consideration of the bills presented to your committee you are confronted with questions which have no religious bearings whatsoever. What you are dealing with in this question of Sunday opening is economics, pure and simple. The expenditure of wealth for liquor, in excess, has been; from the birth of political economy as a science, admitted to be unproductive consumption.

One of the chiefest ends of the state is that of the regulation of the distribution of wealth, and in the exercise of its police power for that purpose, there is no function more legitimate, more praiseworthy, than the protection of the citizens against vice and crime. If it has been found expedient and necessary to limit the traffic of liquors, it has been found so not because of the religious beliefs of one set of people, or those of another, but because of the needs of the entire people irrespective of religion.

There still remain upon our statute books a collection of laws that are obsolete and survivals of an age and a social organism that has been left far behind in the march of modern progress. There can be nothing more menacing to the purity of the administrative body which comes in direct contact with the mass of the people than the retention in our code of laws of statutes against whose enforcement the popular will is arrayed. There is no more fruitful source of blackmail, and it seems hardly necessary to refer to the recent disclosures which have caused more than one department in the municipal administration of our own metropolis to become an object of public suspicion and judicial investigation.

WHAT SUNDAY SHOULD BE.

If it is detrimental to the best interests of the masses to permit the sale of certain goods on the first day of the week because it is the day of rest, recreation—or idleness, if you choose—then we maintain that the same argument applies with equal force to every other legal holiday in the calendar. A cataract of oratory and invective was at a recent hearing of your committee turned upon your defenseless heads, urging upon you the passage of legislation for purposes clearly beyond the province of your legislature and which are expressly forbidden in the Constitution. I would not for one instant argue for the deprivation of the laborer and of every one else of his day of rest. That it is his indisputable right to enjoy it if he so desires must be admitted; and if you, in the exercise of your control over the relations between employer and employee, do not secure these rights and benefits, you fail in your duties to those whom you represent. But make it a holiday in its truest sense, make it a day of rest and a day of recreation; wipe out those old fossilized blue laws that make criminals of those that seek to enjoy on their holiday that which nature provides; let them who wish a blue Sunday observe it as blue as indigo, but do not permit this small minority to compel the majority to sacrifice their legitimate and innocent pleasures or be law-breakers, sneaks, or hypocrites. Respectfully submitted,

ADOLPH BIERCK, JR.

The will of God, which is the alleged source of the moral concepts of Christianity, is all things to all men. Every vicious persecutor in the past found deep inspiration in seeking to enforce what he conceived to be the "will of God." Numberless religious wars—in fact, religion has been the chief cause of wars—have been purposely waged to vindicate the supposed wish of the Almighty. Yet what is the "will of God?" It is still unsettled and undefined. A huge multitude of discordant voices are daily fervently yelling a host of mutually destructive definitions. But there is nothing explained or even simplified. The untrained imagination of the Bible believer is productive of only a confused medley of superstitious notions. Each little ignorant country parson, with the greatest of assurance, carries with ease in his cranium the original and true version of the Almighty's intentions and designs. May the Lord come quickly and proclaim to the world a genuinely authorized program!—Truth Seeker (Bradford, Eng.).

Observations.

The judges of the U. S. Supreme Court are probably Episcopalians, for in their decision on the constitutionality of the income tax law they have done that which they ought not to have done, and have left undone that which they ought to have done. Between their sins of commission and their crimes of omission, there is no health in them. For if there is anything that could justify this extra-constitutional tax it is the fact that there are men who live above labor on the rents of land which they neither cultivate nor occupy and upon the interest of their investments in public securities. But these men, residents and aliens alike, are exempted by the decision of the Supreme Court, while the captains of industry, those who work for their money, who give employment to labor, and who are of appreciable use to the world, are left subject to the unjust and indefensible extortion. As passed by Congress and amended by the Court, the income tax law is now about what might have been expected from those sources.

Some of the younger members of our foreign population appear to get along without reading the papers. The other day a fourteen-year-old Italian boy named Francesco Mazetti was called in the general sessions court as a witness before Judge Hudspeth. Being asked if he understood the nature of an oath, he shook his head, signifying his ignorance of that mystery. Then the judge turned Sunday-school teacher, and inquired of the boy if he had ever heard of God, and again the youthful compatriot of the popes made the negative sign. His honor thereupon expressed his surprise "that a boy could live to the age of fourteen years in any civilized country and not hear of God," and he declined to take Francesco's testimony. Possibly if the court had gone at the witness with the trinity, Virgin-Mary and first, a responsive chord might have been struck; but it is a question to my mind which is the most notable atavism—if that is the proper term for a back-number individual with misfit environments—the ignorant boy who never heard of God, or the learned judge who never heard of religious equality. It would have taken but a few words to explain to Francesco the nature of an affirmation, namely, that if he gave false testimony and was found out he would be put in jail. The supernatural of an oath, which is what the judge had on the brain, would have proved a harder matter to teach, for it is difficult to implant in the natural mind the conception that familiarity with the works of fiction in which God figures as the hero, or as a more or less conspicuous character, has anything to do with the facts of a case now and here being tried. The judge further remarked, "Here is a subject right at home for the missionaries who go to Africa." So I should infer; also that his name is Hudspeth. It is not at all likely that an African court would reject a witness because he was short on the catechism. As for gods, the Africans probably have ten to our one, and would regard Judge Hudspeth, with his single rig, as quite poorly accounted in that respect.

If woman suffrage is not making the progress its promoters desire it should, the most ardent advocate cannot deny that the trend of legislation is toward giving to women and girls advantages that men and boys have never hoped to enjoy. For example, the legislature of Colorado has raised the age of consent to eighteen years for girls, while boys are made guardians of their own morals at fourteen, but I believe the champions of a single standard of morals and of sexual equality have made no protest against the discrimination. Nobody who has had opportunity to observe the facts in relation to this question needs to do more than consult his memory to convince himself that advances in the direction of misconduct are not always nor oftenest made by the boy where both parties are under eighteen, and also that the boy concerned is as much demoralized as the girl. I notice that a physician writing to the Arena accurately places the natural age of consent at pendency, but proposes fixing it legally at majority, and subjecting the male to surgical interference in all cases unless the two are married. Another contributor to the same magazine, Vie H. Campbell, president of the Wisconsin Women's Christian Temperance Union, would repeal all laws so far as the girl is concerned, and prescribe some terrific penalty for the male. It is her belief, doubtless, either that the Bible story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife is untrue or that the nature of the race has changed since that incident occurred. Such laws as these are probably passed by legislators who know that no convictions can be found under them by intelligent jurors. It was confessed by one of these agitators that the present crusade was not inspired by abuses coming to her knowledge. They merely thought that the age was too low, and went ahead regardless of consequences. And they have struck a rich lead, for it is a subject with tankfuls of holy horror in it, and may appropriately be discussed in shrieks.

Gen. James F. Busling, one of the writers for the New York Independent's symposium on Abraham Lincoln, admonishes us thus: "On this the thirtieth anniversary of his assassination let us devoutly say of him, as was said of the good knight of old:

His good sword is rust,
His bones are dust,
His soul is with the saints,
We trust."

Now, the lines that General Busling meant to quote are as follows:

His bones are dust,
His good sword rust;
His soul is with the saints, we trust.

It is perfectly proper, on the thirtieth anniversary of Lincoln's death, or on any other occasion, to quote those lines, provided the quoter really trusts that Lincoln is now training and cracking jokes with the saints; and in such case it would also be proper to say them "devoutly," but whatever the provocation it would be still better to say them correctly.

Representative Walleck of the Illinois legislature has offered a bill to tax "every male person over 32 years of age $25 per year unless he has reached the age of 65 years," "or who can prove that he has proposed marriage to a female of marriageable age at least three times upon different occasions and been refused each time." The proceeds are to be applied to the support of a home for old maids. This is a bill to coerce the male citizen into taking one more wife than he wants, and I pronounce it unconstitutional. Cruel and unusual punishments are prohibited, and a man cannot be put in jeopardy so often. If one man has no wife and is satisfied with that state of affairs, and if another has a wife and finds that one is enough, it would be just as much an act of mistaken kindness to tax the one into changing his condition by marriage as it would be to coerce the other into doing the same thing. The avowed object of the bill is to provide the old maids with husbands, but if the supply of them exceeds the supply of old bachelors, it is evident by the same logic that the married men must double their responsibilities. Of course the penalty in the second case would have to be reduced to $12 50, but the principle would remain the same. Again, it would give the tender sex an advantage over the other of which they would scorn to avail themselves, for there is not a spinster in the world who has reached or passed the age of discretion who has not rejected numerous flattering offers of marriage; having done which she could not in equity be entitled to the benefits of the spinsters' home, supported, perhaps, by taxes wrung from the very men whom her marble heart had condemned to a life of celibacy. As for the male person, he can evade the law by proposing to a female who he is sure would not have him if he were the last man in the world—damned villain that he is.

A WRESTLE WITH CORRESPONDENTS.

The appended communication has been placed in my hands for safe keeping:

BOSTON MASS
Please state in your next paper the advantage the Infidel expects to gain over the Christian and if the churches have not rivalled us what did Christianity the foundation of Education if not what is Please answer correctly in your paper and I will grant you the permit to ask me as many questions as I have asked yours
JOHN SHAWN

Mr. John Shawn, if that is the name of this correspondent, for he has not written it plainly, may be an anxious inquirer, and as such worthy to have his questions answered tenderly. I would say, then, in reply to his first, that the Infidel expects to gain no advantage over the Christian except such as the rejection of an imposture gives him over those who are taken in by it. These advantages are sanity, a right basis for conduct, a free mind, and rational thoughts on religion. If Mr. Shawn does not find them worth gaining he may as well remain a Christian, for Infidelity will not put a dollar in his pocket nor give him the slightest percentage in any inclination which he may have to get the best of his fellow citizens. As to "sivalisation," to adopt for the present crisis the spelling of Mr. Shawn, it may be stated with impunity that various influences have contributed to that desirable end. Christianity, however, has not been among those influences, but in the hostile camp. When the forces of that religion became organized, say 1,500 years ago, they proceeded with the greatest possible expedition to kill off such civilization as existed at that period. That portion of the world of mankind susceptible of culture has worked out its redemption from savagery and barbarism by a system of development resembling evolution, and has incidentally civilized Christianity to the extent that Christianity may be said to have yielded to that refining process. If the church now were what it was under the pocracy of the medieval popes, it would have no members except Oscar Wilde and other aesthetes. When Luther went to Rome in the early part of the sixteenth century he remarked that the mercy of God had not been overestimated, since such men as the leaders of the church were permitted to live. The problem of the ages has been how to civilize the church, and any power which could do that would have a soft snap with the world at large.

"Christianity the founder of Education if not what is." There were educated men when the Christian religion was indistinguishable from the paganism which it is, revamped, but for a thousand years after the fission there was an educational hiatus. Christianity has stimulated education only to the extent that men have investigated the facts of nature for the purpose of showing that Christianity is a fraud—the same as they have studied medicine in order to uproot disease. Such education as Christianity has fostered for its own sake has the demerit of being untrue. "Christianity the founder of Education!" To the same extent that a fish sets out trees.

Now, I wonder who this crank is:

NEW YORK, March 31, 1895.

MR. GEORGE E. MACDONALD: . . . Why don't you and the other Freethinkers attack the priests who are the guilty parties, and leave me alone when I have to work hard and still live a most miserable life, so as not to contract debts which I have no money to pay? [I thought Jesus paid everything. Go fishing (Mat. xvii, 27).—G. M.] The one who steals horses, &c., and sells the salvation of souls for dollars and cents is your Celestial Paternity, Washington, the Spanish Catholic priest to-day. Will you, as well as other Freethinkers who write for THE TRUTH SEEKER, attack in future the priests, the priests, the priests [I give them a jolt occasionally], and leave me in peace? Or is it that you Freethinkers are afraid of the priests because they are many and you want to show your great courage attacking ONE (whom you consider dead and buried)? What a brave lot of fellows you are! JESUS CHRIST ALIVE.

There is more to this letter, the rest of it identifying me by a kind of Ignatius Donnelly Baconian cipher with one "Don Cyril, the Celestial Dragon, Washing-Ton Bacchus," whom I do not recognize; but the interest of the world centers in the name attached more than it possibly can in my origin, which was attended with less sensational features than that of my correspondent. Go to now, Jesus Christ alive; call on Dr. Funk at No. 30 Lafayette place, and inform him whether or not there was alcohol in the wine you made at the marriage doings in Cana of Galilee. If there was, that settles your case with him. The Christian people of New York celebrated last Sunday the anniversary of your entry into Jerusalem, and the bell-ringers of Grace and Trinity churches played the "Arkansas Traveler" in honor of that event. It would have been an appropriate occasion for you to tell us where you got that colt. Are you the person who was crucified, dead and buried, and arose again on the third day? And if so, do you think you could do it again?

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

To Gather at New Rochelle.

There will be memorial exercises this year at the monument of Thomas Paine in New Rochelle, N. Y., on Decoration Day, May 30. As the wall and gate inclosing the monument need repairing, the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, the Manhattan Liberal Club, and the Newark Liberal League will co-operate to make them worthy of the place they fill. The three societies will share the expense of the improvement, and on the 30th of May their members will make an excursion to the spot, where well-known speakers will deliver addresses and the visitors will enjoy themselves. The idea this year is to make the occasion something of a picnic and social gathering, so that the Liberals of this part of the country may become better acquainted with one another. The Brooklyn people have charge of the arrangements, while the other societies will join them in making the celebration a success. More particulars will be given as soon as the program has taken definite form. Meanwhile, Liberals should make a note of the approaching event, and prepare to attend. Such meetings of Liberals are none too frequent.

The Chicago Secular Union has adjourned until next September. It will then reopen with a course of lectures for the winter, and continue the fight for state secularization it has so persistently maintained for fifteen years. At a meeting of members Samuel P. Putnam was elected president; Mrs. M. A. Freeman, first vice-president; E. C. Reichwald, sec. and vice-president; W. G. Reichwald, secretary; Dr. Joseph H. Greer, treasurer; A. M. Freeman, member of executive committee; Dora Hanna, Sarah Gilman, and Mr. Hart, entertainment committee.

News and Notes.

Leaving Chicago March 28, I arrived at Massillon, O., where for a few hours I enjoy the hospitality of J. H. Hunt and take a view of this lively and flourishing city. One of the state hospitals is now located here, and the buildings are already in process of construction. It is expected that the state will contribute a million dollars to this institution, which is to be situated on a noble eminence just outside the city. It will present a beautiful appearance when completed, consisting not of one large, massiv structure, but of cottages of varied and picturesque aspect, scattered over an extensive area. The city of Massillon contributed land to the value of forty thousand dollars to this undertaking, which will be an ornament to this part of the country, and will make an attractiv home for invalids.

Massillon is a fine manufacturing place of about 12,000 inhabitants, and has stood the hard times in good shape. It has been growing all along. It is a Liberal community, although the churches flourish with their usual somber magnificence, except the Episcopalian, which was torn down and now lies in mocking ruins, and the vestry and clergy and bishops cannot rake and scrape money enough together to rebuild it, which of course rejoices the hearts of other sects. The Liberals of Massillon are rather uncertain in their attendance on Freethought lectures. I suppose they think that the world is bound to go ahead any way. I was somewhat discouraged at my last lecture here; but since then Remsburg has been on the ground and drew a large audience. So there is hope that the line will still present a victorious front. Besides Mr. J. H. Hunt, the son of our venerable pioneer S. Hunt, there are John Lowe, Samuel Moe, and others who are always ready to do their level best. I guess Massillon will yet stand up to its ancient prestige, for in the old days, along with Salem, it was a famous camping-ground for radical reformers. Parker Pillsbury once led our forces in this vicinity. After a good round drive with Mr. Hunt, whose family, now in Europe, he expects to join in May—and I hope to meet them all in London—I take the train for Canal Dover, twenty miles away, where I arrive in an hour and meet our well-known friend, S. Toomey. Mr. Toomey is one of the renowned residents of this place, for his sulkies are celebrated the world over among all lovers of rapid horseflesh, for the noble steed can get around the track quicker with one of Toomey's sulkies than with any other vehicle now extant. Mr. Toomey is himself a lover of swift coursers, and he has now forty-six in training on his ample farm just outside the city. Canal Dover, on the Ohio canal, is a pretty good business spot, with plenty of orthodoxy and a sprinkling of Liberalism. The Liberals would make a fair showing if they were only willing to be counted. At present the element is latent. I did not hav very large audiences, but those who came were loyal and in earnest, and an organization was effected. Mr. Toomey has always stood by his colors, and they used to try to boycott him, but it was no go. He did his work too well. Everybody, even the Christian, who had a fast nag wanted one of his carriages, and the Infidelity of the manufacturer only made his wares more available. Mr. Toomey never put forth a bad piece of machinery. It went without saying that his word was as good as his bond and that what he said was as true as steel and unbreakable. At present Mr. Toomey has no fears of the boycott and keeps the even tenor of his way with the respect of the whole community. He is straight up and down in business, though not orthodox in religion. Among others who are willing to stand by him in the forward ranks are his son, Mr. Charles Toomey, and wife; Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Matthews and Levi C. Grim, of New Philadelphia; A. Zimmerman and wife, of Beach City; C. Weaver and D. Hochstetter, of Rogersville; Joseph Hurst, of Barnhill; J. M. Smiley, of Barr's Mills; Samuel Bixler, Francis Bixler, James Rigg, senior and junior, of Canal Dover. Mr. Matthews was for years editor of the leading Democratic paper in the county, and always outspoken in his Freethought sentiments. Joseph Hurst was formerly of England, and came ten miles to attend the lectures, as also did Zimmerman and Smiley, on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER and staunch supporters of the Freethought Federation. Canal Dover and vicinity are ready at any rate to put their best foot forward and make an effort to bring out the reserve forces, and I guess something will be done. The enthusiasm of a few will accomplish far more than the indifference of many.

Samuel Toomey was born in York county, Pa. Leaving home at the age of six years, he was reared among relatives and neighbors, working at any jobs he could obtain, until sixteen years of age. He learned the blacksmith trade near Gettysburg. One year later he started on foot for Ohio, to Sugar Creek Falls. He found employment in the shop of Daniel Wagner. A year later he became owner of the business. Working steadily at his trade, he soon gained the reputation of being the best mechanic in that part of the country. In 1850 he removed to Wilmot, where he remained fifteen years, and, in addition to his original trade, engaged in carriage building and made a reputation for first-class work. In 1868 he removed to Canal Dover. He is the inventor of different patented improvements on carriages. Within the last seven years he has taken out seven patents on track sulkies. Born in the Lutheran church, and joining the United Brethren church in early youth, for the last thirty years he has been a declared Freethinker. He was an old time Abolitionist, a reader of the Anti-Slavery Bugle, published at Salem, the headquarters of the Broad-gaugers. He is a great student and has an extensiv library of Freethought and scientific works.

I enjoyed the generous hospitality of Mr. Toomey and wife. Mrs. Toomey is somewhat conservative, but has no bigotry of sect. She expresses religion in its lovely and humane phase, without the darkness of ancient superstition. Thus I enjoyed to the utmost the campaign at Canal Dover, and leave it with the hope that the labors of the future will result in a golden harvest.

I give lectures in Boston, April 7 and 14, at New York April 19, and at Brooklyn and Newark April 21, and sail for England April 24—

O'er the glad waters of the dark-blue sea,
With thoughts as boundless and with hopes as free.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

I have the pleasure of recording that many of my friends have contributed to the expenses of my journey abroad. Of course this is not a vacation trip, but a continuation of labors for the advance of Freethought. I do not expect to take any rest, but to keep on the move; and as the expenses are considerable perhaps it is but fair play that I should not bear all the pecuniary outlay. I suppose one is aware that if he devotes himself to Freethought work there is no possible chance of his ever making any money. So far as reward is concerned, that is simply in what he does, not in what he acquires. Money-making is a good business and is in many ways for the advancement and happiness of the human race, but some must labor in the world of ideas, if so fitted; and while this is a fascinating labor it is entirely devoid of wealth. I have done my level best in the forward ranks of reform, and up to date I am just about a couple of hundred ahead; enough, if I have good luck, to come back from England without walking across the waters in Christian endeavor style. So these gifts are quite acceptable. They show an appreciation of hard toil, and that friends are willing to cooperate in an undertaking that is beneficial all round. I am sure it will be of great service to the Liberals of America to understand the struggles of Freethought in the Old World, to have pictured to them the scenes and the glory of the battles of the past, and the promises of the future. There are great and beautiful things for us to learn in the Europe of to-day that will be helpful to us in this New World, that will give us more of the meaning of human history and the splendor of human hope; and I shall devote my time and pen to expressing the greatness of these, so that all my readers can travel with me, and we together will enjoy the marvelous landscapes and the nobility of human genius. I cannot help quoting some of the friendly letters I have received in support of my present undertaking. Dr. E. B. Foote, writes:

About the first thing I pick up in THE TRUTH SEEKER is the letter from the Pilgrim. I follow him in all his pilgrimages with the greatest interest; and I have no doubt in his voyages and travels the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be treated with something more humorous and poetically descriptiv than ever. I respond with cordiality and enthusiasm to your contemplated labors on the other side of the ocean.

My veteran comrade, Judge Brewer, says:

I gladly send you something to help your trip over the waters. Our Freethought people generally ought to aid. You are working in our cause and have been for years with altogether inadequate compensation in dollars and cents.

J. A. Calder, writes:

I can't do much; but your labors in this cause ought to be remunerated somewhat better than they have been, and I hope to see the day when they will be. I shall look forward with delight to your letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER from Merry England and Bonnie Scotland.

S. F. Benson, writes:

I wish it were a hundred I could give you. I realize how poorly Freethought work is paid. I hope to see the day when we shall be banded together in more effective shape. We have to fight two enemies now, the church and poverty.

George A. Cooper, writes:

Your letters are very interesting and I wish I could do more than I now do; but I trust that other friends will do better as they are able.

F. D. Rexford, writes:

I wish I could do much more. I shall enjoy reading "News and Notes" while you are away. We shall all get the benefit.

These are some of the expressions of friendship and good will throughout the ranks of Freethought. We are in a common cause and it is encouraging to know that heart and hand are united and that we do not have to keep up the struggle alone.

The names of those who have contributed are as follows: M. A. Hewitt, Geo. A. Cooper, James A. Greenhill, Jonas R. Ellison, John Kane, N. F. Griswold, S. F. Benson, M. P. Braffet, J. A. Kimble, Mrs. P. Van Hoeter, Stephen Brewer, Dr. E. B. Foote, John Brosi, F. D. Rexford, John D. Powers, G. W. Whittemore, J. A. Calder, Charlotte G. Palm, Louis Roser, Capt. C. C. de Rudio, John J. Duffy, Ralph Helm, Maligus Boehmer; to whom I send my heartiest thanks.

Letters of Friends.

Has Worn Out One Copy.

POSEN, MICH., March 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $4 50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the "Free-thinker's Text-Book" in cloth. This is the second Text-Book I am willing to sacrifice for the missionary work among the Christians. Good book for the purpose.

VINCENT D. VINCENT.

Anything but Indifference.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., March 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to continue my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. My excuse for not sending sooner must be my eighty years and ill health, which cause occasional forgetfulness, but not indifference to the cause of Freethought.

JESSE HOOKER.

A Home Missionary Committee.

NOBLESVILLE, IND., March 23, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1 for eight copies of "Age of Reason." We have formed a committee of Freethinkers for missionary work among our Christian neighbors, and think we can do the work best by lending the books, and when returned, lend to others.

JAMES OLDAORE.

It Is Our Guiding Star.

GRANT CITY, MO., March 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Within find $6 to apply on my subscription, which is past due. I hope the advance payment will partially restore my credit with you and encourage the principle of Freethought, which is the only road to lead us out of the blind ruts of superstition and religious bigotry.

With many good wishes, I remain a friend to our cause.

B. PRUGH.

The Ring of the True Metal.

REDMON, ILL., March 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2—one for defense of J. B. Wise, the other for the man who deserves "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and has not the "filthy lucre." I forget his name. [Capt. Otto Thomson.] If enough has been already subscribed, put it where, in your judgment, it is most needed, and believe me to be "one that is willing to sink one-half his possessions for freedom to think."

Truly yours, MARK ROWE.

They Prefer to Borrow.

GROVE CITY, O., March 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received the book, "Right Living," and like it much. Now I send you $8 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and books. I tried to get some new subscribers, but failed; all had excuses. One says his wife is opposed, another can't afford it, another has no time to read it. They have all been reading my papers and books and seem to like them. Now, when I want books I cut off a corner somewhere else and send for them. WM. NEISWENDER.

Send Help Promptly.

KINTZ, O. T., March 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The winter has been very bad; feed is all gone. There are few or no seeds in the country. The religious societies have sent aid to their members and we Freethinkers are left out. Some need more than seeds and feed, but we think if we had seeds we would try it for another crop. If you can aid us send to the address below.

Eighteen to Fourteen.

DRESDEN, IND., March 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see that I have been trespassing long enough; find inclosed $6.50 for a ride on THE TRUTH SEEKER craft till '96 and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I worked for eighteen years for the church. Developed out of its clutches, and have done good work for Freethought for fourteen years. Have this neck o' woods pretty well liberalized. The preachers are losing ground; they never tackle me any more as they used to do in the days of yore. Wish I could do more for the cause, but hardly anybody has any ready cash to spare.

M. ASHCRAFT.

Freethought First.

YAZOO CITY, MISS., March 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Freethinker in every sense; I want to think for myself, and I want Mr. Wm. McKinley to have the same right, but when he begins to think away any of my natural rights, I want to call a halt. I was in hopes that he would be president. Now I ask for information: Will Freethinkers support him after what I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER about his support of Sunday laws? Is it possible that a man cannot be found in the United States and induced to run for that place for whom a Freethinker can conscientiously vote? I have political policy, but it is governed by the idea of Freethought; when anything conflicts with Freethought then I do not support it.

Respectfully, J. C. WILSON.

Wants Tracts Illustrated.

LEETONIA, O., March 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It goes without saying that those who would be most highly benefited by the perusal of Liberal literature can seldom be induced to carefully examine such writings. In such a case would it not be a good plan to have Watson Heston's most telling illustrations printed suitably for posting, so that "Brother Bigot" might catch an eye-opener at a glance whether he would or not? THE TRUTH SEEKER thinks it a good idea, but does not want to incur the expense of their production now. I have not a great amount of the needful at command, so here is a chance for some philanthropic person to "lend a hand." I think Freethinkers would be glad to use these cartoons and pay enough for them so that those who bear the initial burden might again receive their money. What think you?

Yours for man's mental emancipation,

How to Liquidate a Church Debt.

WALLA WALLA, March 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am informed that the Baptist church of this city owes about one thousand dollars. One of the members, a poor, half-foolish girl, owns about eighty acres of land not far from the city, but she is rich in religion, and she considers that all to Christ she owes. Consequently she conceived the pious idea of giving up her claim to the church to pay the debt. Of course she did not have sense enough to know that when the present debt was paid the knowing ones in the church would make other improvements to the value of another thousand, and remember that their rich members could pay off the debt in fifteen minutes if they would. They were about to take this poor girl's all, but one of the sensible sisters protested against such a crime, and the scheme fell through. But the next thing was to expel the honest sister from the church for not allowing the church to reduce the girl to extreme poverty. I am reliably informed that the good sister defies them to remove her from the church. All I blame her for is, that she does not remove herself from such a crowd.

V. D. LAMBERT.

Kansas to the Front.

BURLINGTON, KAN., March 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Kansas is comparatively a young state, but she does not take a back seat for any of her older sisters, not even for staid old Massachusetts. Our last legislature enacted a law known as the "Anti-gambling law." It is considerable of a jumble, but, as nearly as I can interpret it, if a boy plays marbles "for keeps," he is liable to imprisonment. If I toss up a penny with my boy in my own house to see who takes the penny, we are both liable to imprisonment. If a neighbor happens to be present in the house at the time, he is liable to imprisonment, although he takes no part in tossing the penny. Moreover, if I live in a rented house, the owner of the house is liable to imprisonment, although he may live fifty miles away and know nothing of what is going on; always provided the law is enforced. What is most surprising is that this obnoxious bill passed into law almost without opposition. It is generally claimed that the law will not be enforced, but that depends on who violates it. It may be enforced when we least expect it. It is not intended that such fanatical laws shall be generally enforced. If they were, the penitentiary and the jails would not hold the people.

WM. COX.

A Little Too Much Chaplain.

CHEMAWA, OR., March 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith $1, which by an accident I acquired yesterday. It is like drawing teeth to raise a dollar now in this state. The Grand Old Republican party had full control of our last legislature, and they walked all over the taxpayers. I cannot see where we are going to get the money to pay taxes, which will be about 8 per cent on the present value of all property in the state. They voted away hundreds of thousands to all kinds of boodling schemes, and the public schools all over the state are closing for want of funds to run them. But there was one scheme that I must give them credit for killing dead; that was an attempt to create the office of chaplain for the state prison, asylum, and reform school, at a salary of $1,200 per year.

That was a little too salty for even this "reform" legislation. It got 20 votes out of 60 in the house on a motion to refer, but only 6 or 7 were in favor of it, and the committee sat down on it and never reported on the monstrosity. Of course you know that Dolph was elected to stay at home, and as they could not agree on either a gold-bug or a silver-bug, they elected a straddle-bug, G. W. McBride, one of the old state house ring.

J. F. BEATY.

Insulting Concession of a Right.

CROSS PLAINS, TENN., March 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Send my next paper to Portland, Tenn. I am going to leave this place, chiefly on account of opposition to the religious element. The school directors will not employ an avowed Agnostic. They of course reflect the sentiment of the religious part of the community, which is in the ascendancy here. Last week a preacher here prayed that this government might soon be under the control of the church. He simply echoed the sentiment of the church militant. Think of the magnitude of the work to be done before Freethought can obtain! It is discouraging, but it should make Freethinkers only the more devoted, earnest, and energetic. Although the bill to enable Agnostics to testify in courts has passed in the legislature, it is so worded as to be an insult to every one whom it was designed to benefit. It gives the Agnostic the privilege of testifying in court, but virtually says to him that he will probably not tell the truth. Even in this shape it passed in the Senate by 16 to 14. Those 14 should go down in history as the "infamously immortal 14" opposed to truth, justice, and patriotism, and in favor of proscription, persecution, disfranchisement of Agnostics, and control of the state by the church. They justly merit the contempt and honest indignation of every patriotic Tennessean. Though they have not spoken publicly, there are a great many Agnostics in Tennessee. They will feel keenly the sting of the obnoxious bill just passed.

Fraternally, W. D. COCKRAN.

Modern Infamy.

VINELAND, N. J., March 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: What sin or crime is there of which the Bible dupes will not be guilty?

The Bible has tortured
Nine millions to death,
As honest and truthful
As ever drew breath,
Who could not believe
That its filth and its lies
Ever came from a being Enthroned in the skies.

One hundred thousand
Were burnt or were hung,
Of honest good women—
Some old and some young,
All tortured as witches,
And evil from birth,
When no real witch
Ever lived on the earth.

And the same spirit is alive here in Vineland to-day, just after a union revival meeting of three or four weeks, held by all the churches. There is here a family who were once Jews, but now make no profession of any kind of religion, but are what would be called Infidels, Freethinkers, or Liberals. The father was a dealer in dry-goods, remnants, and other articles.

They have a family of five children, aged from eighteen months to nineteen years, and they are by far the most intelligent family of children I have ever seen in New Jersey. They have lived here six years, and in that time have had their windows broken in twenty-three times by stones and other missiles thrown through them, and it cost him $1 every time to put in the large pane; and last Saturday night, during the eclipse, a bullet was fired through the weatherboards of their house and found lodged in their bed, and all this outrage was committed simply because they were not Christians. Vineland should watch for the villains. If Vineland can't find a remedy for such doings it is time for the state or national government to take hold of the subject.

J. HACKER.

He Founded It in His Later Years.

NAPLES, N. Y., March 31, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: While living in Virginia the past six years I found it to be the prevailing idea that Thomas Jefferson founded the University of Virginia, but I have never found any mention of the fact in our Freethought papers. Can you give me any information on this subject?

It was while living there that I found that Christianity does not lift people above local prejudices, for while here in New York the women were expected to talk and pray in church; there they were not allowed to, because St. Paul said they should have no voice in church matters. Here colored people are members of the same church with whites; there in Virginia they must have churches of their own, for they are not the equal of the whites, and are supposed to go to a sort of secondary heaven and be subject to orders from the inhabitants of the first heaven, while a great many doubt if a "nigger" has a soul at all.

The colored people are true representatives of those who follow blind, unquestioning faith, and interpret the teachings of the Bible literally. But what intelligent white man takes the Negro race as an example of what Christianity will do?

The Negroes are already Christianized but not educated, consequently all further advancement must come from education.

I have the honor to be a friend and acquaintance of that old Roman, John Peck, who is well known and respected in this town, where he has lived and labored so long. Wishing you success, I am, an honest doubter, FRANCIS E. WELD

Has Obeyed One Bible Command.

BENTONVILLE, ARK., March 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper contains more solid information than all other reading matter I get. I will be able to help you some little in a short time. I have a wife and twelve children. It takes all of the money I can get to clothe and feed them. I am a farmer, and have no other means of support. I have more land than is necessary for me to hold, and as soon as I can sell I will purchase some Freethought literature. I have three grown daughters and one son all at home; all read THE TRUTH SEEKER. My wife is a Methodist, and will not look at the paper; she says it is the work of the devil. If so, I say, turn the devil loose; he does his work well. We are aiming to get J. E. Remsburg this fall. The Christians got enough of him about one year ago in his debate with some orthodox preacher at Rogers, in this county. His debate with the minister is bearing such fruit that they don't want any more Remsburg; he shook them from center to circumference, and they are still trembling for fear he will return. There is a fine opportunity for some good lecturer in Arkansas, as Freethought and reform are taking root in this country. I hope it will grow to full maturity. Church bigotry endeavors to suppress it by trying to keep all Freethought journals and Freethought books from the rising generation. They are afraid to let them hear both sides. Freethinkers, as a rule, read more or less religious literature; we are not afraid of the truth; it is falsehood we hate; we are tired of superstition and bigotry. Turn the light on and let the rising generation seek the truth by the light of progress and science. In that book of inconsistencies called the Bible we read that God said, "Let there be light, and there was light." Was there ever a god to utter such an expression? If so, he is very remote from this country. But Freethought and reform says, Let there be light, and wherever Freethought literature is read there is light.

Yours for justice, C. L. HART.

The Prayer Superstition.

NEW YORK, May 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The following extract from a church program is being circulated among "sinners" by the management of that church, and to anyone of sense it must seem rather peculiar that in this day, in New York, such stuff would be admitted even as an advertisement in one of those senseless sheets known as "religious papers:"

EFFICACY OF PRAYER.

From a Sermon preached in a West 33d street Baptist church.

Nowhere is there a clearer illustration of the fact that God hears and answers prayer than in the remarkable history of the — Steamship Line. It is said that on the day that the first ship of this line was launched Mrs. — devoted the whole day to prayer, for the special blessing of God upon it, that his hand would still the angry waves in the time of storm, and that the people who were borne across the ocean should receive his special care.

And that prayer has been signally answered, and lo! for these fifty years, through storm and calm, those ships have sailed the deep and never lost a life. No other line, although with ships as mighty, and commanders with large experience, has made a similar record, and the mighty barrier that has shielded these great ocean greyhounds has been the arm of Almighty God in answer to that noble woman's prayer.

When I go to Europe, I'm going by the — Line.

When millions, instead of one woman, were praying for the restoration of Garfield or Lincoln, where was the "efficacy of prayer?" Where were the answers to the many prayers made by P. P. Bliss, that God would restore them to their loved ones, when instead they were lost in the "Ashtabula horror?"

Rev. Mr. Bothwell, of Brooklyn, a much loved and brilliant "servant of God," was one day giving medicine to his sick child. As he held the little one on his knee, he drew the cork from the bottle with his teeth. In his attempts to keep the child in a good humor by laughing, he swallowed the cork, and for days the people of the churches of Brooklyn were united in asking God to spare his life.

No use. This God did not notice them, and after days of suffering this was his reward. He left a wife and fatherless children without a shadow of any means of support. Will God care for them? No. Where is the much-talked-of "efficacy of prayer" in their case? BEN ELLIS.

Will Wonders Never Cease?

LOS ANGELES, CAL., March 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $3 to renew my subscription and to aid you in retaining your seat on the tripod while you turn loose ideas that shall move the world along. Possibly you may wonder at my having such a volume of money at one time, so I will explain how it happened. For forty years I breasted the waves of sin and sorrow in this wicked world without owning a church pew; but several months ago I bought one, and took it home with me. Since then the Lord has been with me almost continuously, as he was with Jacob in the days of old; although, unlike Jacob, I have not been in the stock-raising business, making a specialty of the ring-streaked and speckled kind. In my case the presence of the Lord has been manifested in my success as a wage slave in finding a master; for since I got that pew, whereon I daily sit to meditate on the goodness of God and to come in "rapport" with the holy ghost, I have not wanted for a job, although numerous cases of suicide are taking place all over this state for that reason. Verily this pew has been a mascot, bringing work, money, grub, peace of mind, and religious consolation; and I would advise every man afflicted with enforced idleness, or desiring success of any kind, to get a church pew and take it home, as I have done. Another church is now being destroyed in this city to make room for worldly affairs in the shape of stores and tenement rooms, and the pews being taken out are thoroughly sanctified from long years of service and weekly contact with the bodies of the saints who have worshiped thereon; and this fact is mentioned for the benefit it may be to those who have thus far failed to succeed because of their estrangement from God. Now, to strengthen belief in the conclusions I have formed, two remarkable—yea, wonderful—incidents in connection with my pew are here given. Just before the last birthday of the Lord's son, I felt the need of a good turkey to properly commemorate that anniversary, and going into a place where such birds were being raffled off, I laid down my five cents and entered the contest with the dice box and eighteen competitors. The Lord being with me, of course I won, and a fourteen-pound turkey became mine. Again, an accident occurred in which I was laid up for one week, but a fellow victim, who owned no pew, was disabled for four weeks! Now if any man fails to see the hand of providence in such otherwise inexplicable events, he must be an unreasonable skeptic, and I have no desire to discuss the matter with him. It is enough for me to know that the Lord was with me, and is to this day, and I now rest in perfect security on that sanctified pew, knowing that my wants have an unfailing source for their supply. That my happy experience may benefit others is my earnest wish.

C. SEVERANCE.

The Views of a Persecuted Adventist.

EVERETT, MASS., March 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to thank you for sending me your issue of February 15th, in which you refer to my defense in the Malden court (Mass.) for violation of so-called "Lord's day." The article ably and truthfully exposes the false colors under which the National Reform party, Sabbath Union, and Sunday Protective Leagues are sailing. Truly the conflict is an irrepressible one, for the Sunday law agitators aim not only to change our Constitution, and enact a national Sunday law, and remodel our state laws, but are working for an international Sunday law. And by sailing under false colors of union, temperance, workingman's friend, etc., and catering to the Catholic church, the mother of church-and-stateism, they will succeed in overthrowing the grandest form of civil government ever known to the history of man.

Why should the sons of our forefathers so soon forget the priceless cost of true American liberty and independence from a church-ruled government and priestcraft-slavery?

Why do they not rise as one man, and demand that the Constitution shall be sustained as it is, and all state laws framed in harmony with its grand declaration of liberty and inalienable rights? Why so soon forget the disgraceful attempt and result of trying to govern the New England colonies under a theocracy, especially here in Massachusetts? Why forget that under the separation of church and state the church has enjoyed its greatest freedom, protection, and prosperity? Why do they not see that, while they allow without a protest a bigoted faction to abridge the equal rights of citizens, be they Infidel or Christian, they are permitting the undermining of our liberty, and that what is a safeguard for one is a safeguard for all? I answer: Because they are lulled to sleep by the modern pharisaical soothsayers, who, like as of old, "teach for doctrine the traditions and commandments of men." Because pulpit orators have ceased to persuade by the gospel of love; they have substituted political essays well calculated to tickle the ears of the thoughtless, especially office-hunters who seek a boom for office under the guise of religion. Because of the pleasing fable that the millennial dawn is going to be ushered in by making this, and other nations, Christians by law, and in order to do this, and save this nation, they insist that the Sunday law must be enforced.

In conclusion, let me draw a parallel between the modern Pharisees and the ancient ones. The ancient ones were very zealous that their traditions relative to the Sabbath should be observed lest the foreigners come and take away their place and nation, and because Christ and his disciples did, on that day, that which they declared to be unlawful, therefore they sought to kill Christ, notwithstanding he is Lord of that day and defined what was lawful to do.

The modern Pharisees are just as zealous that their traditions relative to Sunday keeping shall be observed in order to save the nation. And those who follow the example of Christ, and his teaching relative to the Sabbath (Saturday), are spied out, fined, and imprisoned, worked in the chain-gang for daring to exercise their liberty.

The ancients succeeded in killing Christ, and if the modern Pharisees can resurrect the old Blue laws of Massachusetts and Connecticut, they will judge them "as obstinate, wilful, and incorrigibly wicked, and on the third offense put them to death."

Respectfully yours,

WAYNE T. GIBSON.

A Badly "Flustered" Minister.

NIPOMO, CAL., March 19, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I must begin my letter, I believe, with an apology for coming again so soon, but a paragraph has recently appeared in the San Francisco Examiner which is a deliberate falsehood and an insult to every Freethinker in Nipomo, and I would like to brand it as such through your paper if I may. This is the paragraph:

NIPOMO, February 28.—A six days' debate closed here last night between O. A. Phelps, of Colorado, in behalf of Freethought, and Rev. J. E. Denton, of Sacramento, in behalf of the churches. It was a great triumph for the churches. The moral sentiment of the community was revolutionized.

As it is dated the 28th, and the debate closed the evening of the 27th, it must have been a telegram, and as the ministers were seen telegraphing the next morning, we can be reasonably sure of the source of this unmitigated falsehood. Now, in the first place, Mr. Denton was supposed to be here to defend the Bible, but this says "the churches," and I really think they are right for once. "The church" (to most ministers) means their bread and butter, and Mr. Denton's debating was certainly of a very bread and buttery kind, if I may use such a term, for I believe, judging of the reverend gentleman's actions, that he would have preferred standing up to be kicked for six nights instead of trying to debate, always providing such a course would have been as lucrative a business. In the second place, the Freethinkers are among the best citizens of Nipomo, and have ever been. And we now have a Freethinking justice of the peace, postmaster, and constable, to say nothing of a host of good citizens. In fact, it took "imported ministers" to discover that we were Anarchists or Socialists, or, in fact, that we were in any way different, as a body, from other honest, law-abiding people. Again, I have seen nothing of any moral revolution; if one has taken place here, it was certainly not among Freethinkers, and if there is a revolution in the Christian camp I am inclined to think it is mental rather than moral, although there may be room for both, for all I know. The question in this debate was, "Resolved, That the Bible is entirely of human origin, and inculcates an imperfect code of morals." The first three nights Mr. Phelps demonstrated quite plainly that there is nothing in the Bible which the brain of man could not have originated, and that there is a great deal in it which no all-wise God would have inspired him to write. Mr. Denton's magnificent defense of the inspiration of the scriptures was to say that he didn't care if there were two hundred and seventy-thousand errors in the Bible, he didn't care if there were a million, and a little later he said, "I am going to prove all of it that I can, all of it if I can." Mr. Phelps, in his reply, said he wondered if Mr. Denton cared if the Bible were all errors, and asked him if he was going to prove the errors which he had just admitted along with the rest. But Mr. Denton did not condescend to enlighten us any further on God's errors. A little later he was forced to admit that whatever proved the Christian religion, also proved the heathen religions, and wound up the first night by saying that any religion was better than none. He said, too, that if he could prove one word of the Bible to be inspired, he had won his case, so he took the word "God," declaring, "We must have the thing before we can have the name." Mr. Phelps then asked him "how about spooks, hob-goblins, and witches, mermaids, etc?" Mr. Denton ignored all of the question except the word mermaid; that, he said, just suited him as an illustration of his side of the case, for it was a combination of known things. By reading from the Bible Mr. Phelps soon demonstrated that there was plenty of material "in stock" for a Jehovah, "pure wool" for his hair being one great requisite (Dan. vii, Rev. i), and nothing more was heard of the God-idea. Josephus, too, died a violent death during this debate, but Pliny, Tacitus, and even Renan were dragged in as contemporaneous writers, and answered just as well, apparently, to the uninformed. Another brilliant "point" made by the gentleman from Sacramento must have made even the Christians in the audience blush if they ever read their Bibles. For he said that even if Confucius, Aristotle, and others did write and teach practically the same as the Golden Rule, it was handed down to them from Moses, when we all know that the Mosaic law was an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, etc., instead of doing to others as you would wish them to do to you. He also stated that Michael Bakounine was the greatest of Freethinkers, and laid the corner-stone of Freethought.

All that I need to say in regard to this is that the first martyr to Christianity (so far as I know) died in the fourth century, and Bakounine was not born until the beginning of the nineteenth century, after Paine and Voltaire were both dead, and long after Bruno, Vanini, and numbers of other brave souls had laid down their lives that Freethought might live. This statement was made some time after the first three nights. The last three Mr. Denton attempted to show that the Bible taught a perfect code of morals, and that it taught nothing wrong. His way of doing this was to show up the imperfections of everything else under the sun and let the Bible strictly alone; this was not Mr. Phelps's way of treating the question, and he read and quoted scriptures, until Mr. Denton was compelled to fall back on his knowledge of Latin (a language of which we common mortals were quite "innocent," of course), in order that we might not see how badly he was nonplused; as "ad nauseam" cut a prominent figure, however, we gathered that he was not exactly pleased with the situation. Finally, two interested spectators whispered to Mr. Phelps, and when his time came he proposed that we take up a collection to buy the gentleman a Bible. Mr. Denton would not take the hint, however, and continually quoted uninspired writers to prove the inspiration and perfection of the scriptures, and even took it upon himself to say that if the inspired Paul were speaking to-day, especially with regard to women, he would talk very differently. But then I rather agree with him in this last myself. I think Paul would talk "differently," or do some pretty lively "sprinting" to keep out of the way of fathers, sons, and brothers, to say nothing of sweethearts. Mr. Denton also felt called upon to offer on the rostrum (not outside, mind you) a gratuitous insult to every woman whose head is so shaped that she must think her own thoughts regardless of the clergy. He said: "The most shameful thing on earth, it seems to me, is a woman who calls herself a Freethinker," and the worst of this is that it called forth rounds of applause as often as he had a mind to refer to it; not so strange, though, considering the fact that three brother ministers held down prominent seats on the platform and started the clapping regardless of points, and a certain element would always follow. Another of Mr. Denton's knock-out arguments was Liberal, Mo. I believe he wilfully misrepresented Liberal, but we will let that go; he made himself ridiculous, anyway, by stating that free-love was the staple product there, and then telling of desperate efforts of the clergy to get in there. When we laughed, he said of course they wanted in for missionary purposes.

I must also say in closing that I believe a new era is dawning for Nipomo. The lion and the lamb have not lain down together, but something far more wonderful has occurred. All the churches have been lying together since the debate, where before was ever discord and bickering.

Yours for Freethought,

BERTHA WILSON FOREMAN.

You and I;

Let us hear the music playing,
You and I;

Will we find in the cup of pleasure,
All there is in life's grand measure,

Or will music sing of duty,
You and I?

We are living in this world,
You and I.

Let us always teach utility,
You and I.

We should learn the one great lesson,
In this world of mirth and passion,

There is a cause for every action,
Be the action good or bad;

Let us cultivate the good,
You and I.

We are living in this world,
You and I;

Let us build our lives with virtue,
You and I;

We should bury all contention,
About the future and the past,

And live to be of service
To humanity, while we last;

Trusting the future for more harmony,
You and I. C. N. W.

Youthful Shrewdness.

"Mamma, I flak I am not well,"
Said lazy little Mabel,

The beans I'd given her to shell
Neglected on the table.

Her dimpled cheeks with roses vied;
Her eyes the stars resembled;

The chubby form my faith defied,
My darling has dissembled.

"I'm sorry, dear," I gravely said,
"Because you'll miss the puddings.

The place for sick folks is in bed,
With not a taste of good things."

She thoughtfully smoothed out her dress,
This naughty little sinner.

"Then I'm not sick just now, I dess.
I'll wait till after dinner."

Correspondence.

CHARLES CITY, IA., March 23, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: As this is my first letter to the Corner, I will not write much. I am a Freethinking girl, twelve years old, and study reading, spelling, geography, language, and music. I do not see any use of their having music in the school. We have to neglect other studies that would do us more good than music. My teacher says when we get older we will be glad that they had music in the schools.

If any little Freethinker, boy or girl, would like to correspond with me, I would gladly answer. Yours truly, ROSALIND TITUS.

[Rosalind will not be sorry that she has a knowledge of music, but she must give all the attention possible to her other studies, for school days are soon over.—Ed. C. C.]

TACOMA, WASH., March 14, 1895.

MISS WIXON: Being at leisure I thought I would write to the Corner. Papa has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time. There are a great many Freethinkers here. Mr. C. B. Reynolds came here, over a year ago, and lectured. Soon after we organized a Tacoma Secular Union. It had a great many members, and would have had more, but people were afraid if they joined it the church-going people would not patronize them in their business. It has failed since, to our sorrow. Mr. Charlesworth is thinking of coming here, and he has written to several Liberals. I will close my letter now, hoping all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are well and happy.
FRIEDA WILDE.

[We hope the Secular Union may soon revive and become a power in Tacoma, and that Frieda will be one of its wide-awake and active members.—Ed. C. C.]

MCPHERSON, KAN., March 21, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Corner to let you and the Corner friends know that Mr. Graves, the publisher of the Little Freethinker, has lost all his bedding and some of his type by fire. I want you all to send him some money so he can replace the things he lost. Those who want to send him money can either send it to Mr. Graves at Hastings, Michigan, or to the editor, Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Pulaski county, Va. When you send it to Mrs. Slenker you will have to tell her it is for Mr. Graves. If you can send only a few cents it may help him out some. I will send him twenty-five cents; mamma sends him twenty-five cents, and my brother is going to send him some also. I think Mr. Graves must be a single man, for if he had a loving wife at home, she might have saved his things.

Yours in truth, CARRIE S. KUBIN.

[We hope all will heed the above appeal that Mr. Graves may be amply remunerated for his loss very soon.—Ed. C. C.]

CROSBY, TEX., March 23, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I like to see the Children's Corner with many letters in it.

There seem to be some Bible readers who can devote their time to nothing else. I think all children should have their choice between religion and liberty. Let them have all of the Freethought literature they want, and give them the Bible, and let them take their choice—be a Christian or a Freethinker. But if he or she, as the case may be, has a spoonful of sense, Freethought will be preferred to religion. Nine times out of a hundred, though, the parents will keep the children's heads buried in the Bible, or some other like literature, and never allow them to look at such a book as the "Age of Reason." Well, I am sure I will never be a Christian unless they bring to the front something better than the Bible is to prove to me that Christianity is true.

Your Liberal friend, BELLE HARVEY.

[Always seek for evidence. Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good, is an excellent motto. Every one will agree that Belle is a bright and interesting girl, not likely to be imposed on.—Ed. C. C.]

BEEBE, ARK., March 29, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see very few letters from the sunny South in our Liberal paper. We have good people here, but they don't dare think for themselves nor look at both sides of religion. This is the home of the "one horse preacher," who keeps the people scared with his "Jesus book," but some are looking for light, and they always get it when they come to our house. Two years ago but few church people would come to see us, because we were all infidels. My papa lectures on Freethought. But they are over their scare. Everybody comes now, and many say he is right. We keep a summer resort four miles north of Beebe. Beebe is a beautiful town of one thousand inhabitants, and a pleasant climate. It is quite healthful here, and homes are cheap. Many people in the North could get a home here who cannot own one there. I would like to correspond with some of the Cornerites. I am fourteen years old.

With best wishes to Aunt Susie and cousins,
EDITH WYATT.

[Edith is a bright, wide-awake girl, and the weeds of superstition will never root in her pathway. May she live long to do good and be a blessing to her parents and friends.—Ed. C. C.]

GARDEN GROVE, IA., March 18, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I wrote once to the Children's Corner, and am now doing it again. I am old and have no children of my own, but I am much interested in reading the letters of the little witches and pleased to see them sign themselves "your little infidel," and "your little Freethinker." Colonel "Bob" says when women begin to reason and babies sit on lap of philosophy, the world will soon get rid of priestcraft, ignorance, and superstition. I think in about twenty years from now, when the Cornerites are grown to be women and have homes of their own, there will be lots of sweet little babes sitting on the lap of philosophy. You are doing a grand work in fetching women out of the churches and from under the bondage of priestcraft. There are women here in our town who spend half of their time gadding around raising money to fix up their church and keep their beloved pastor sleek and fat, while their own homes are mortgaged beyond redemption. Ignorant Christians say that infidels do not want their children to grow up and believe as they do. I want to refute them by making a nice scrap-book of letters from the Children's Corner. Go on with the good work.
JOHN CARNAHAN.

[Thanks, friend John, for your kind letter. We are glad you like to read our young folks' letters, and that scrap-book will be a little gem when you get it done. Your words of appreciation are very encouraging.—Ed. C. C.]

Doesn't Get Around in Time.

Tommy: "Do you say your prayers every night?"

Jimmy: "Yep."

"And does your maw say hers?"

"Yep."

"And does your paw?"

"Naw. Paw don't need to. It's almost daylight when he gets to bed."—Cincinnati Tribune.

Desirable Real Estate

FOR SALE

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 56 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes' walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes' walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE

BETTER WORLD

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye can see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominations Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies	$1.00
Fifty copies	4.50
One hundred copies	8.00

CHAMBERS'S CONCISE GAZETTEER OF THE WORLD. Topographical, Statistical, Historical. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. Cloth, 8vo. 768 pp. Price, $2.25.

This volume is chiefly a condensation from Chambers's Encyclopedia, although many of the articles are new and there are numerous additions to the list. The work is convenient to hold and handle and much information is packed into a small space. We notice an amusing blunder made by the writer of the preface. He is speaking of the allusions to famous persons, places, or events, such as the "sage of Chelsea," the "victor of Barossa," and the "Chiltern Hundreds." Among the rest is the "Hermit of Walden." Now it so happens that that is the only reference to Thoreau or to Walden there is in the book!

THE CYCLOPEDIA REVIEW OF CURRENT HISTORY. Edited by Alfred S. Johnson, A.M., Ph. D. Vol. 4, 1894. Buffalo: Garretson, Cox & Co. Paper, 8vo., illustrated. Price, $1.50 per year, 40 cents per single number.

This is a much-needed and excellent publication. It admirably supplements the standard cyclopedias by bringing the record of events down to date, or within two or three months of it. Every person who has occasion to consult a cyclopedic—as what person has not—will not need to be reminded that those books of reference are costly and new editions are gotten out only at infrequent intervals, and even if they were brought down to the end of each year the element of cost would shut most of the new editions out of the homes and offices of a great majority of the people. But this "Cyclopedic Review" will fill in the gap very well at a moderate expense. It should be a great financial success for its enterprising publishers.

HYPNOTISM: How It Is Done; Its Uses and Dangers. By James R. Cooke, M.D. Boston: Arena Publishing Company. Cloth, 12mo., 373pp. Price, $1.50.

This book is one that can be read with profit by all, for it is written in the purely scientific spirit by a physician who is too cool an observer and too little of a partisan to exaggerate in one direction the importance of given facts or to minimize it in the other. The conclusion is that hypnotism may often be used by the physician and less often by the surgeon to relieve pain and mitigate or cure disease. He finds that some may be helped thereby who cannot be relieved by other agencies, while, on the contrary, it fails totally in other cases of the same disease. He urges that the subject be studied and experimented with for the sole purpose of getting at the facts, not to establish a preconceived theory for or against. There is nothing of the sensational, of the marvelous, of the supernatural, of the superhuman about the book. It is a refreshing contrast to most of the popular works dealing with the same subject, books which can fill the minds of reasoning, cool-blooded men and women with weariness and disgust only.

POPULAR SCIENTIFIC LECTURES. By Ernest Mach. Translated by Thomas J. McCormack. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Company. Cloth, 12mo., 313 pp. Illustrated with forty-four cuts and diagrams. Price, $1.

These lectures, delivered during a period extending from 1864 to 1894, are upon these topics: The Forms of Liquids, the Fibers of Corti, on the Causes of Harmony, the Velocity of Light, why has Man Two Eyes? on Symmetry, on the Fundamental Concepts of Electrostatics, on the Principle of the Conservation of Energy, on the Economical Nature of Physical Inquiry, on Transformation and Adaptation in Scientific Thought, on the Principle of Comparison in Physics, on Instruction in the Classics and the Mathematical-Physical Sciences. They are in the popular style that such lectures must be if they are to have hearers in the first place and many readers when put into book form. In his preface to this volume Professor Mach observes that only a small amount of information can be conveyed to the hearer in the limited time accorded to a subject, but that in such lectures, if the matter is appropriately chosen, "the charm and poetry of research can be conveyed to them." "It is only necessary to set forth the attractive and alluring features of a problem, and to show what broad domains of fact can be illuminated by the light radiating from the solution of a single and oftentimes unobtrusive point." In this way also is shown the substantial sameness of scientific and common thought. The general public loses its shyness toward scientific questions, while it is forced upon the consciousness of the lecturer that "his work is only a small part of the universal process of life, and that the results of his labors must redound to the benefit not only of himself and a few of his associates, but to that of the collective whole."

The lectures are all interesting and instructive; but perhaps "Why has Man Two Eyes?" will longer hold the attention of the average reader, because the subject is one that so appeals to our experiences and imaginings. Referring to photographic and stereoscopic work, the lecturer observes: "You know that if you move much while your photograph is being taken, your picture will come out like that of a Hindoo deity, with several heads or several arms, which, at the spaces where they overlap, show forth with equal distinctness, so that you seem to see the one picture through the other. If a person moves quickly away from the camera before the impression is completed, the objects behind him will also be imprinted upon the photograph; the person will look transparent. Photographic ghosts are made in this way." Another especially thought-provoking lecture is the last—on Education.

BROOK FARM: Historic and Personal Memoirs. By John Thomas Codman. Boston: Arena Publishing Company. Cloth, 12mo., 335 pp. Price, $2.

This book is supposed to give the inner, intimate history of "The Brook Farm Experiment," an experiment conducted by a small group of famous or noted men, some one and some the other. Mr. Codman remarks that there were two distinct phases of the associated life at Brook Farm. The pioneers established a school and combined with it farm and household labors. Then came an attempt to introduce "methods of social science and to add mechanical and other industries to those already commenced." The two periods covered are commonly called the Transcendental and the Industrial. It appears that the records of the institution are missing, probably long ago destroyed, and the book before us was compiled and written from a few memoranda and the author's memory of the experiences he and his associates underwent in their attempt to solve the social problem. It is written not so much to gratify curiosity or to record the deeds of the men and women who were wise "before their time," as to whisper courage to the reformers of to-day who are wrestling with the same great issue. Mr. Codman points out that the "Brook Farm life and ideals were purely coöperative and philosophical," and he expresses the opinion that a few weak trials made fifty years ago were not enough to solve the question of right living and determine how to shape the outward forms of society. He confides to his readers the wish of his heart that his sketch of his early days may inspire some who can command the influence and means necessary "to continue the experiments in social science, along lines laid out with more or less clearness by the Brook Farmers."

The originator of the movement was the Rev. George Ripley, a Unitarian minister who had gravitated into Transcendentalism; the place selected was at Brook Farm, West Roxbury, nine miles from Boston. At the first there were about twenty persons in the settlement, among whom was Nathaniel Hawthorne. When taken it was a milk farm and early each morning one of the colony started for Boston with a load of milk. The work was new to most of them, and for the women it was particularly hard, as there were so few compared with the number of men, and visitors and pupils added to the burden. In the fall of 1842 the Brook Farm school was started with teachers in Intellectual and Natural Philosophy and Mathematics, Belles Lettres, Latin and Music, German and Greek, Theosophical [?] and Practical Agriculture, History and Modern Languages, and four in the primary and infant classes and drawing. Charles A. Dana was the instructor in German and Greek. After about two years of the work along the lines originally laid down it was determined to extend the industrial enterprise and to take into the society practical workers even if not educated to the degree at first deemed essential. This action alienated the more theoretical of the outside friends of the enterprise, as Ralph Waldo Emerson, for instance. But the book will tell you all about it, much better than we can.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. 141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Gems of Thought.

THEOLOGY has only served to upset brains, and sometimes states.—Voltaire.

POINTING to another world will never stop vice among us; shedding light over this world can alone help us.—Whitman.

RESISTANCE to aggression is not simply justifiable but imperative. Non-resistance hurts both altruism and egoism.—Herbert Spencer.

THE only trouble with this great country of our is that it is running all to politics. The tax-eaters are carrying it off like a thousand tiny ants rolling a disabled caterpillar.—Galveston News.

THE old countries, the so-called effete races, are quite apt to birth and nurture genius. Newly-discovered countries may be absolutely barren of men of the first type. The new land may give the pioneer. The old land may give the preserver. Even this cannot be uncompromisingly asserted. The margin of uncertainty is too wide.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE poor, the feeble, the helpless, precisely those whose pitiable estate appeals most strongly to the sympathies of man, the Supreme crushes, relentlessly, unhesitatingly. The survival of the fittest, not the best, but the best adapted, those who can offer the stoutest resistance—is the rule of the "benevolent" controller of the universe.—John Francis Smith.

At the risk of being called a faddist, I declare with no uncertain voice—for it is the voice of the coming era—that all the sports of the strong, dependent on the pain and oppression of the weak, are unworthy of good and noble men, who, were they not blinded by custom, fashion, and tradition, would rush to the rescue of a defenseless animal, instead of hounding it to a terrible death.—Mary Campbell Smith, in Westminster Review.

THERE is the greatest difference between presuming an opinion to be true, because, with every opportunity for contesting it, it has not been refuted, and assuming its truth for the purpose of not permitting its refutation. Complete liberty of contradicting and disproving our opinion, is the very condition which justifies us in asserting its truth for purposes of action; on no other terms can a being with human faculties have any rational assurance of right.—J. S. Mill.

THE optimist folds his smug hands on his ample knees, and murmurs contentedly, "The Lord has willed it"; "There must always be rich and poor"; "Nature has, after all, her great law of compensation." The pessimist knows well self-deception like that is either a fraud or a blind, and recognizing the seething mass of misery at his doors gives what he can—his pity, or, where possible, his faint aid, in redressing the crying inequalities and injustices of man or nature.—Grant Allen.

WHEN one thinks of the Greeks playing, praying, laboring, lecturing, dreaming, sculpturing, training, living everlastingly in the free wind and under the pure heavens, and thinks that the chief issue of civilization is to pack human beings into rooms like salt fish in a barrel, with never a sight of leaf or cloud, never a whisper of breeze or bird—oh, the blessed blind men who think of progress! Progress, that gives four cubic feet of air apiece to its children, and calls the measurement Public Health!—Ouida.

THE idea of suicide as an immoral or criminal action had its origin in the belief that mankind is sent to earth by a supreme being with a certain allotted length of days. If man dies at two-and-twenty of small-pox, tumbles off his horse at five-and-forty, is killed by a railway accident at sixty, or dies quietly in his bed at ninety, it is equally the will of God and by his commands. Although we do not recognize them by name, we still continue by implication to accept our ancestors' theory of the Norns who cut the thread of human fate whenever a man's life had come to a close.—Agnosco, in Agnostic Journal.

JAMES I. said: "No bishop, no king." He might have added: No cross, no crown. The king owned the bodies of men; the priests, the souls. One lived on taxes collected by force, the other on alms collected by fear—both robbers, both beggars. These robbers and these beggars controlled two worlds. The king made laws, the priest made creeds. Both obtained their authority from God, both were the agents of the infinit. With bowed backs the people carried the burdens of one, and with wonder's open mouth received the dogmas of the other. If the people aspired to be free, they were crushed by the king, and every priest was a Herod, who slaughtered the children of the brain. The king ruled by force, the priest by fear, and both by both.—Ingersoll.

PIANOS! PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

REV. DR. McAULEY, an aged minister of Philadelphia, has been convicted of leading a double life and the Presbyterian board has fired him. There is hope for the Quaker City yet. Who would ever have supposed that any Philadelphia man had so much life?—Sunday Telegram (Portland, Me.).

AN Ohio preacher tells his congregation that "Chicago is the nearest approach to hell that we have upon this earth." This may or may not be true, but should any Chicago congregation extend a call to the Ohio preacher at an increased salary the haste with which he would go to the terrestrial hell would mitigate to an extent the superstitious horror of the credulous Buckeyes.—Sunday Telegram (Portland, Me.).

OUR little four-year-old Alice is a small interrogation point, and often makes remarks which confound her elders. Last Sabbath, after the older children had gone to Sunday-school, her mamma undertook to give her a Bible lesson. All proceeded nicely until Alice asked: "Mamma, where is God?" Her mother answered, "God, my dear, is in your heart when you are good and love people." Silence and deep thought on the part of Alice, then came "Mamma, please take my heart out and look at him."—New York World.

DOCTOR P. was riding in the suburbs of Buffalo with his small boy, and stopped at a tavern to water his horse. The child watched the operation intently, and evidently thinking it clumsily managed, piped out: "Papa, why doesn't the horse take the pail up with his feet and drink?" "Why, he can't make that way." "Why not?" "Well, God didn't see fit to make him so." "Why didn't God make him so?" "Ah! that beats me. How should I know?" The infant's respect for his father clearly suffered. "H'm!" he said, after a moment's hesitation: "I'll ask grandma. She knows God."—Buffalo Commercial.

A good, old Methodist lady attending service in a suburban Episcopal church last Sunday became happy under the preaching of the word, and ejaculated: "Glory!" She was admonished to keep quiet by two of the brethren, and nodded assent, but soon becoming forgetful, responded "Hallelujah!" The brethren again called her attention to the annoyance, and told her that if she did not keep quiet they would be compelled to remove her. The sermon proceeded, and the old lady becoming very happy, and forgetful of her surroundings, shouted out: "Glory to God!" This was too much for the brethren, and they tried to lead her out; but she refused to walk, so they carried her. On the way she said: "I am honored above my master, for while he was carried by an ass I am carried by two."—Philadelphia Record.

TAM GORDON was a small farmer, a bachelor, and he lived alone—minus some things that make life worth living for some people, but fully satisfied with the deprivation so he were spared the troubles and anxieties attending the advent of wife and bairns—and the extra work required for their maintenance. His parson, however, did not think Tam was altogether doing his duty to the kirk and his queen and country by so closely following his own inclinations, and undertook to remonstrate with him. Tam had no great necessity to leave his solitary couch at a very early hour, and it was not, therefore, surprising that the minister found him one morning just finishing his modest breakfast of brose. "Why, Tam," said he at once, marking the many evidences of bachelordom on all sides, "why don't you marry, and hav a nice body about your house to keep things tidy. See what a nice breakfast she'd cook for you." "Yes," replied Tam, "and eat half of it, too, eh?" "Well, but see how nicely she'd mend your clothes, and sew on your buttons, and maybe she'd mak' ye a new suit of clothes." "Ay," said Tam, "and I'd hav to buy her some new clothes, too!" The minister saw Tam had no soft spots on these lines, and tried another. "You know, Tam, it's your duty as a loyal citizen and a member of the kirk to take a wife. Suppose all men followed your example, the race would come to an end. Did not God order us to be fruitful and multiply? And will not his blessed plan of salvation be lost if we do not obey him?" Steadily Tam looked at the minister as he asked, "What did God make Adam out of?" "The dust of the ground, of course." "And who was the father of Jesus Christ?" "The Holy Ghost, Tam," innocently replied the minister. "Well, then," said Tam, "if the Lord wants a big population to work his plan of salvation upon, he may send down the Holy Ghost, or turn that big hill at the back of the house into men and women. He can hav as many as he wants, but I'll no be troubled with a pack of brats."

JUDGE RUDOLPH B. MARTINE, of the court of General Sessions of New York, has recently died.

On April 5 five persons were killed and several injured by an explosion of powder in a grocery and ship chandlery at New Orleans.

The bill for the disestablishment of the church in Wales has passed its second reading in the House of Commons by the vote of 304 to 260.

The Metropolitan Traction Company (cable) of New York has added $8,000,000 to its immediate resources by putting mortgages on all its property.

The Spanish government has called out 20,000 of the reserves to restore the strength of the army, depleted by the sending of reinforcements to Cuba.

JAPAN continued her military preparations up to the very last moment before the armistice went into effect. There are said to be 80,000 Chinese soldiers in Formosa.

The Yale faculty has ordered Harry Moffat Wilson to leave college for his refusal to be vaccinated. His father resides at Newburg, N. Y., and does not believe in vaccination.

A DETROIT man has published and copyrighted a "Triby Appendix," consisting of an English translation of the passages and words which in the original "Triby" appear in French.

MRS. PARAN STEVENS, long the woman leader of the "Four Hundred," died at her home in this city of pneumonia on April 4. She was born in Lowell, Mass., about seventy years ago.

In Michigan the Republicans elected, on a very light vote, their candidates for judge and for regents of the university by a majority of about 25,000. Last year their majority was 106,000.

At the municipal elections the Democrats won in Bridgeport, Conn., and the Republicans in Cleveland, Ohio, and Winona, Minn. In Ohio several women were elected to positions on school boards.

PITTSBURGH coal men say that there is no danger that long distance transmission of electricity generated by water power will injure them, as they can send a ton of coal a thousand miles by water for 25 cents.

JINGOISM is costing France dearly. The attempt to conquer Madagascar has involved an outlay of $13,000,000, and the Tonquin affair cost $107,000,000, while Tonquin is a constant drain on the French taxpayers.

In this country the yearly crop of peanuts amounts to about 88,000,000 pounds. Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina are the chief producers, in the order named. In 1892 Africa shipped 400,000,000 pounds of peanuts to Europe.

BRITISH troops are fighting with the hill tribes of northern India. In a late "battle" in Chitral with 12,000 tribesmen under Umbra Khan, 500 of the natives fell in death under the fire of the Maxim guns of the British, while the latter lost very few in killed and wounded.

GREAT Britain reiterates her determination not to submit the Venezuelan difficulty to arbitration unless it is conceded in advance that she is to retain the territory within what is known as the Schomburg survey of 1841. She has asserted this position for eleven years.

ST. LOUIS went Republican by the unprecedented majority of 13,000, but Moses Craven, one of the candidates of the winning party, a Republican in good standing, was beaten, a Democrat securing the office. Mr. Craven is a Negro and his opponent is a white man.

A COMBINATION has been formed by the soft coal operators, the coal-carrying railroads, and the miners to give stability to prices, freight rates, and miners' wages. This will keep the price of coal up to consumers, but provides for the miners, a new thing in the coal business.

THE Cuban revolt is spreading; American consuls in Havana and Santiago think that it must be suppressed soon if it is to be suppressed at all. Many exiled insurgent leaders are landing, having come in from South and Central American states, the Spanish navy being unable to efficiently patrol the coast.

At the recent municipal election in Chicago the Republicans carried the city by a majority of some 45,000. The entire Republican city ticket and all the town tickets were elected. Nearly all the Board of Aldermen are of that party. The mayor elect is George B. Swift, defeated at the interim election by Mr. Hopkins, Democrat. The issues, as in St. Louis, were local.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, replying to the recent speech of Lord Halifax in reference to the reunion of the Church of England with the Church of Rome, declares that any corporate union with the Church of Rome "while she retains her distinctive erroneous doctrines and advances her present un-primitive and unscriptural claims is absolutely visionary and impossible."

W. L. CHAMBERS, United States Land Commissioner to Samoa, reports that he found but nineteen American citizens there, exclusive of officials. The Commission, consisting of himself and Commissioners representing Great Britain and Germany, rejected the vast bulk of acreage claimed by Americans because of the manifestly inadequate consideration given for it and because the titles were defective.

On April 3 Judge Barnard at Newburg refused the application of the Anti-Vaccination League of Newburg for a mandamus requiring the Board of Education to permit children who have not been vaccinated to attend the public schools. As a compulsory education law has been passed the decision of Judge Barnard leaves parents who object to vaccination no remedy. The April issue of Foot's Health Monthly, of 129 East 28th street, New York, is an anti-vaccination number.

ANOTHER of the old landmarks of New York is going; Niblo's Garden is being torn down to make room for a modern office building. In 1851 Adelina Patti made her debut upon its boards as a child of eight. Gerry and his Society for the Suppression of Budding Genius were not in power then or she could not have delighted the public at that age. With the old building are associated the memories of many other famous actors and singers, including Dion Boucicault, Madam Sontag, the Ravels, and Madam Rachel.

THE last batch of indictments handed in by the grand jury of the court of Oyer and Terminer, this city, were against George C. Clausen, Nathan Straus, and A. B. Tappen, ex-Commissioners of Parks, for alleged conspiracy in making illegal contracts for asphalt pavements, ball, $1,500 each; Thomas Killilea, police captain, bribery, bail, $10,000; Thomas J. Brady, formerly Superintendent of Buildings, bribery and accepting unlawful gratuity, bail, $10,000; Hugh Cassidy, Edward F. Miley, John H. Thrall, patrolmen, attempt to extort, bail, $3,000 each.

OVER the veto of Governor Holcomb the legislature of Nebraska passed a bill which provides that the governor, attorney-general, and commissioner of public lands and buildings shall constitute a board having the authority to appoint the persons who shall constitute the Omaha Fire and Police Commission, two of whom may be of the same party. This has been done against the protest of every prominent business man of Omaha; it cuts the mayor off from all participation in the control of city affairs. The attorney-general and commissioner of public lands and buildings are A. P. A. men.

GEN. SAMUEL J. LEE, second to Frederick Douglass among the colored people of the country, died in Charleston on April 1. He was for seven years a member of the South Carolina legislature, was its speaker, the father of an amendment to the state constitution which prevented any increase of the debt of the state without the vote of the people, and he also secured the passage of a measure which freed the state from a debt of $7,000,000 contracted by the Moses ring. He came within thirteen votes of being elected judge of the supreme court of the state, and he inaugurated the present free school system of the state. As a lawyer he ranked high; it was his boast that of 110 persons accused of murder whom he defended but one was executed.

THE United States Supreme Court by a tie vote leaves the income tax in force, except the provisions taxing incomes from land, and from state, county, and municipal bonds. This is understood to be the division of the court on all the propositions involved, as ascertained by the World: For declaring the law constitutional with the exception of the tax on rentals and on state and municipal bonds—Justices Harlan, Shiras, Brown, and White. For declaring the whole law unconstitutional—Chief Justice Fuller, and Justices Field, Gray, and Brewer. For declaring the income from real estate rentals exempt—Fuller, Field, Gray, Brewer, Shiras, and Brown. For declaring the income from state and municipal bonds exempt—all eight.

THOMAS McDONALD lay in wait for and shot Thomas Patton in Sumner county, Kan., May 5, 1894. On his trial he frankly confessed the deed, but refused to consider himself a murderer. He said that Anderson Gray, a wealthy farmer, had hypnotized him and "suggested" the murder of Patton. Gray had also instructed him in the use of the revolver and rifle, with which he had supplied him, and had selected the place by the side of the road where McDonald lay in ambush for his victim. The jury acquitted McDonald on the first poll. Then Gray was put on trial and convicted of murder in the first degree as the principal in the procurement of the crime. The case was carried on appeal to the supreme court of the state, which on April 6 sustained the ruling of the lower court. It is the first case of the kind in the United States, if not in the world. So says Judge McAdam of the superior court of New York. Of course men accused of crime have pleaded that they were hypnotized, but for a man to be convicted of murder on the ground that he used hypnotic influence is something new.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. . . . Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

GROWTH AND DECAY OF THE CHRIST MYTH.

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

Allies of Comstock.

We recently spoke at length concerning the bill drafted by Mrs. Burt and Mrs. Pritchard and introduced in the New York Senate by Mr. Mullin. In the World of April 7th we find the full text of the bill introduced in the House by Mr. Ainsworth. It is for the same purpose as the Senate bill. Its title lays out a pretty big contract:

"An act to amend Sections 316 and 317 of the Penal Code in order to better protect public morals, defend the health and integrity of youth, prevent the degrading of women and girls, and preserve the honor and respect due to women."

In all particulars in which this bill differs from the Burt-Pritchard-Mullin affair it is worse than that attempt to accomplish the impossible. One of the things that no one must do on the stage is to "shock modesty." As it would be out of the question to put any performance on the stage that would not shock what passes for the modesty of some person, this bill might as well have been entitled "A bill to prevent all theatrical entertainments." That would have been much more clear and no more inclusive than the present title and would have saved the state some money on printing bills. One section absolutely forbids the exhibition anywhere of any representation of any male or female form, "whether real or fictitious, in the nude or semi-nude state." This, literally applied, would kill the business of the photographers, for the exposure of the face involves the representation of semi-nudity. It is also forbidden to show a picture which exhibits "the form of a female" in any "unwomanly or immodest posture, or as nude, or clothed in any other than proper, womanly, or modest apparel." Presumably the rural gentlemen in the legislature can tell to a nicety what postures are "unwomanly," and what clothing is "proper, womanly, and modest." They should have no difficulty in doing that much, for they seem to be real smart. The exceptions show the poverty of spirit and the meanness of the originator of this bill. The exceptions are "original works of art when displayed in and confined to art galleries," and "standard medical works, drawings, or text-books designed for physicians or medical students when kept to their lawful uses and purposes." It appears to have been taken for granted that the thousands of both sexes and all ages who visit the galleries will not be hurt by the examples of nudity and semi-nudity they view there, but that the same persons will be corrupted if they see copies of the originals elsewhere. Or were original paintings and statues excepted because the "moralists" did not dare attack them? Notice the monopoly given to the medical fraternity. Medical books may be sold so long as they are used only by physicians and students, but if they are sold for the benefit of the common people a misdemeanor is committed. The kind of fanatical ignorance and pruriency that is behind these bills is indicated by the advice given by the late Dr. Howard Crosby to women, as quoted by Nym Crinkle in the World of April 7th. He told them to throw out of the window all their carved and painted Cupids, for they were iniquitous devices of the devil. The Mullin bill makes it a penal offense to post in any place, "public or private, with or without the consent of the owner thereof," any of the prohibited devices. This would enable the officer to come into one's private house, and put Dr. Crosby's advice into effect, "with or without the owner's consent." What next?

Educators and Editors on the Bible.

In another part of this paper the reader will find an account of the contest over the Bible in the schools in Waverly, Pa., so far as the legal fight had gone at the time the article was prepared. After Judge Gunster delivered his opinion several leading educators in Philadelphia were interviewed and asked what they thought of the exclusion of religious teaching from the schools, and particularly regarding the scope of the decision rendered by the court. The answers given were of the kind to be expected from orthodox Protestants, and their use of the word "sectarian" is the one with which we have grown familiar through long and careful reading of theocratic and "patriotic" publications.

Dr. Edward Brooks, superintendent of the Philadelphia schools, approved the decision of Judge Gunster (as he interpreted it) and said that "under no circumstances should there be any sectarian teaching allowed in the public schools." "Good for Dr. Brooks!" admiringly exclaims the Free-thinker who has not familiarized himself with the methods of word twistification adopted by the Christian patriots; "the superintendent of the Philadelphia schools ought to be sent a membership blank of the Federation or Union; he is undoubtedly a good Secularist." Not quite so fast, please; let us hear further from Dr. Brooks: "As to the reading of the Bible, the rules of the board of public education require it." Then, after quoting the rules pertinent to the question, he added:

"This is the sentiment and general practice throughout the state of Pennsylvania. It is also the practice, with some exceptions, in the public schools of other states. This rule of reading the scriptures in the public schools is appropriate for a Christian country. To take the Bible out of the public schools would seem to imply that we have lost faith in those principles of morality and religion upon which the nation was founded. While I hold as sacred personal convictions, especially in regard to religion, I do not see how anyone, whether he believes the Bible to be an inspired book or not, can object to that pure morality which is taught in its pages."

How about the good Secularist now? We see at once how much he means by "sectarian." Does Dr. Brooks think that it is a part of the business of a civil government to teach religion in the public schools even if the majority of the people do believe in one religion? What does he understand the separation of church and state to mean? He must admit that a large element of the population, while Christian, is opposed to the reading of the Protestant Bible in the schools, the majority of these because they deny that that version is the true version of the scriptures, and the others, consisting of Adventists, Unitarians, and other Protestant Christians, because they hold that such reading is sectarian instruction within the proper meaning of the word, as it undoubtedly is. He must admit that there is a very considerable element of the population that does not concede that the New Testament is properly a part of the Bible. He must admit that there is a large minority who do not accept the Bible as a divine work and who consequently object to their children being taught that it is of divine origin and sanction. Hence he must admit that this is not a Christian country, in the sense that all its people are Christians, and he must also admit that only a majority—probably only a minority—of the Christians favor Bible reading in the schools. Is it possible that he cannot see the injustice of taxing all for the propagation of the religious opinions of a part of the people? It is not necessary to deny that the nation was founded on the principles of morality and religion found in the Bible to show the untenableness of Dr. Brooks's position. No matter what religion the nation was founded on—if any—the Constitution expressly provided that neither its doctrines nor the doctrines of any other religion should be propagated by the state. The framers of the Constitution knew too well what the union of church and state had done to curse humanity to allow them to be negligent of their duty in providing safeguards against such dangerous union in the new world. As matters of fact, however, the principles of morality upon which the nation was founded are the common property of the race, and therefore do not belong to any particular religious system, nor do the dogmas of any religion form component parts of the basis of the national institutions.

Dr. Brooks expresses his doubts as to the possibility of any one objecting to "that pure morality which is taught in its [the Bible's] pages." No one is objecting to the "pure morality," but there is so much in the Bible that is not pure morality that parents may well object to the use of the book in the schools. All that is good in it can be found in works that are free from its very serious defects, while even the good in it is so often associated with theological doctrines which are rejected by large numbers of parents that it is grossly unjust to require them to send their children to schools in which it is used and to tax them for the support of those schools. But the one great and in itself insuperable objection to the use of the Bible in the schools is the undeniable fact that it is a religious text-book, a sectarian text-book. It is preposterous for Dr. Brooks to proceed on the assumption that Protestantism is not sectarian and that Christianity in its entirety is not sectarian. Every unprejudiced and logical-minded man and woman who has thought for a moment on the subject knows that the use of the Bible in the schools is a sectarian performance, and that it is intended to be such, for the so-called "moral" teaching is only a pretext to carry the sectarian propaganda into places where it would encounter strong opposition if urged frankly for what it is, religious missionary work.

Dr. Brooks had much to say for the value of the Bible as a literary text-book, and he remarked that were he an Infidel, he should want his children "to hear, read, and study and commit to memory passages from the sacred volume, not only for the pure morality which it inculcates, but also for the literary culture which it is so well adapted to afford." If he were an Infidel his sense of justice would be so sharpened that he could see the wrongfulness of compelling those who did not have that exalted view of the book to contribute to the expense of its distribution and of forcing them to submit to having their children taught that which they did not believe to be true. Leave the inculcation of lessons found in religious text-books to the parents of the children. It is not for the state to interfere in the matter, nor the church through the state. The literary style of Colonel Ingersoll is very charming, and even Christians will concede that, his anti-theology aside, his teachings are moral, but we seriously question if Dr. Brooks would be willing to send his children to a school in which the colonel's works were used as literary standards and ethical text-books. The moral is obvious.

"And so long as the Bible remains in the courts of justice, to give sanction to testimony, so long it seems to me should no one on legal grounds object to its being read in the public schools."

Does Dr. Brooks think that all witnesses should be compelled to lay their hands upon or place their lips to the Bible when preparing to testify in a court of justice? Has he never heard of the oath administered without the aid of the Bible? Does he not know that in all enlightened states the witness may affirm if he prefers? Is he not aware that in his own state of Pennsylvania all three forms are legal? Where, if such choice is allowed, is the implied parallel between the presence of the Bible in the courtroom and the reading of that book in the common schools where all the pupils must hear, or perhaps take part in the reading and make responses, and recite selections from the Bible?

Avery D. Harrington, a member of the Philadelphia school board, made the same exposure of his inconsistency as did the superintendent. He said:

"No sectarian doctrine or form of worship should be permitted in our public schools, but the rule of the board of public education, requiring the Bible to be read without note or comment, is entirely proper. It is the duty of the public schools to inculcate morality and the principles of religion, and there is no book in the world so well qualified to do this as the Bible."

There you have the customary erroneous and pernicious use of the word sectarian. By this time it should be understood by all that the employment of that word by any Christian is no guide whatever to his real meaning. You build on sand if you assume that because he is opposed to "sectarian instruction" in the schools he is against the reading of the Bible therein. In fact, the chances are largely in favor of the supposition that he is a theocratic bigot. Don't be fooled by fair professions, whether made by individuals or by societies. Where did Mr. Harrington get the idea that it is any part of the function of the public schools to teach the principles of religion? How can a state wherein the civil and the religious elements of authority are separate teach the principles of religion in the schools or elsewhere? Is there not here a flat contradiction in terms?

Are not these Pennsylvania educators aware that Christian judges have time and again decided that the reading of the Bible in the common schools is an act of sectarian worship and that such an orthodox Christian paper as the New York Independent has heartily and unreservedly indorsed those decisions? Is it possible that they do not know that in 1872 the Supreme Court of Ohio sustained, on appeal from the superior court of Cincinnati, the school board of that city in the exclusion of the Bible from the schools? In answer to such arguments as those we are here considering, the court said:

"We are told that this word 'religion' must mean 'Christian religion' because 'Christianity is a part of the common law of this country,' lying behind and above its constitutions. Those who make this assertion can hardly be serious, and intend the real import of their language. . . . Suppose the state should undertake to teach Christianity in the broad sense in which counsel apply the term, or the 'religion of the Bible,' so as to include also the Jewish faith—where would it begin? how far would it go? and what point of disagreement would be omitted? . . . Government is an organization for particular purposes. It is not almighty, and we are not to look to it for everything. The great bulk of human affairs and human interests is left by any free government to individual enterprise and individual action. Religion is eminently one of those interests, lying outside the true and legitimate province of government."

Justice Welch, in the opinion he rendered for the court, said that the reading of the Bible in the schools was "a state religion in embryo," that it involved the levying of a tax for the propagation of religion, and that no Christian would think of asking for the teaching of religion in the public schools if Christianity were a minority faith in this country. He said that "legal Christianity is a solecism, a contradiction in terms," and argued that the fact that our fundamental laws do not attempt to enforce Christian doctrine is "strong evidence that they are the laws of a Christian people." What does the Christian Mr. Harrington think of that? For decision entire see 23 Ohio State, 211 et seq.

In 1890 the Supreme Court of Wisconsin reached the same conclusion as that found by the Supreme Court of Ohio. It was unanimously held that the reading of the King James version of the Bible in the common schools of the state was sectarian instruction within the meaning of the constitution; that such reading was an act of worship and as such was forbidden by the organic law of the state, and that it involved the taxing of the citizen for the support of religion. So important did the judges deem the matter that each, although fully agreeing with the opinion of his associates, considered it advisable to reinforce the general argument with reasons which suggested themselves to his own mind as particularly pertinent and forcible. Here are a few sentences from the opinion of Justice H. S. Orton:

"As the state can have nothing to do with religion, except to protect every one in the enjoyment of his own, so the common schools can have nothing to do with religion, in any respect whatever. They are as completely secular as any of the other institutions of the state in which all the people alike have equal rights and privileges. The people cannot be taxed for religion in schools, more than anywhere else. . . . They are godless, and the educational department of the government is godless, in the same sense as the executive, legislative, and administrative departments are godless. . . . It is a sectarian book."

Other members of the board were as earnest as Mr. Harrington in favor of driving sectarianism out of the schools by always enforcing the rule of the board requiring the reading of the Bible. There are in this country a number of reformers who claim that no man should be naturalized unless he can correctly interpret the Constitution of the United States. By a parity of reasoning, these Philadelphia educators and school officers should be at once disfranchised. They have utterly failed to understand one of the most important principles of the nation's organic law.

The Scranton Tribune agrees with Dr. Brooks and the others. It says:

"If the effect of Judge Gunster's ruling shall be to drive the Bible from our public schools, the result would be, in our opinion, an almost irremediable misfortune. The state is a Christian state, so far as concerns morality; it has recognized the moral worth of the Bible by introducing that book in its courts as the symbol of sacredness; and there are most important and far-reaching reasons why the Bible should be made a part of the public school curriculum, not as a feeder of sectarianism nor as a provoking cause of denominational or religious disputation, but as a source of pure morals and an unequaled repository of literary treasures. Fortunately, nothing in Judge Gunster's decision, as publicly reported, challenges the right of a teacher to read the Bible in the schools. It merely—and properly—denies the right of Bible reading to be expanded into sectarian or denominational proselyting."

Will the Tribune be so kind as to point out a law of the state of Pennsylvania, intended to protect person, property, or life, that is distinctively Christian in its origin? Just one, please. The state recognizes the alleged restraining influence of the Bible upon those who accept it as the word of God by putting it in its court rooms. It has been held that the believer will not perjure himself if he swear upon the Bible, not because the Bible is a moral book but because he thinks that its author will send him to hell if he does not tell the truth. That it is not the ethics taught in the Bible or supposed to be taught in it that is to have effect upon him is amply demonstrated by the fact that it is taken for granted that the same Christian's word cannot be trusted if he is not sworn, although his belief is no less when not sworn on the Bible than when so sworn. The ignorant Christian is sworn on the Bible for the same reason that the Chinese witness is sworn in the presence of a decapitated chicken—to scare him into telling the truth. The moral character of the Bible has no more to do with the Christian's testimony than the moral character of the sacrificed rooster has to do with the testimony of the Chinese. The two fetiches are used to try to get the truth out of two men bred in different superstitions and upon whom the fear of the penalties of perjury are supposed not to have a sufficiently deterrent effect. But experience has shown that Quakers, Freethinkers, and others who affirm make better witnesses than the oath-takers.

The Tribune is well aware that its "source of pure morals" cannot be read through by course by any preacher to his congregation, unless, perchance, by some chaplain in a penitentiary where only males are confined, and even then he would be running grave danger of making his hearers tenfold more the children of crime than they were before if he did not administer some powerful antidotes along with many of those Old Testament records of treachery, spoliation, rape, and murder. It is simply amazing that a secular newspaper should seriously advocate making any religious book a "part of the public school curriculum." Where were these "teachers" educated? Do they know absolutely nothing of the foundation principles of religious freedom upon which this republic was founded? They are all glad of Judge Gunster's decision in so far as it will prevent the expansion of Bible reading "into sectarian or denominational proselyting." That is, each sub-sect is jealous of all the others and is willing to be shut out itself for fear that if it were let in some of the others would get there too and secure more of the spoils than it could obtain. That is why they are opposed to "sectarian" teachings, but they are more than willing to unite against the Jew and the Free-thinker and teach at public expense the dogmas common to them all. To make definitions unmistakably clear, they are opposed to denominational instruction, but they are eager to include sectarian instruction as part of the regular routine of the common schools.

"An Important Intimation."

There are, we regret to say, between one thousand and two thousand of our friends who have allowed their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to expire without renewing. This is a considerably larger portion than is pleasant to us, who depend upon the more or less prompt payment of subscriptions for the wherewithal to meet our bills. Now, we are not going to get angry, or scold, or do anything disagreeable about this, but we must appeal to our friends' good nature and generous feelings to remedy this deplorable and unsatisfactory state of affairs. We need the money badly—so do our creditors. The paper man, and the printer, and the compositor, and the mailer, and the post-office collector, and the clerks, and the landlord, and the insurance man, and the gas man, and the devil are always with us, not to mention the rest, and they all want money and want it bad, and want it when it is due. And when we haven't got it for them life is a burden—they make it so intentionally, blast 'em.

So now, as aforesaid, we appeal to our friends all over this country—thousands of them—to send the amount of their arrearages and as much in advance as they have been behind, to sort of even things up and turn about in fair play, as it were. A year's subscription from each one whose time has expired will make us easy—very easy—but if we can't have that then let us have what you can spare, and we will "grin and bear it" until you get the balance. The amounts are small individually and easily raised, but to us they collectively mean a good deal—just the difference between being even with the world and being unpleasantly behind.

The disciples of a certain philosopher, one day missing their teacher from his accustomed place in the midst of them, sought him at his unpretentious lodgings, where they discovered that he was suffering from the lack of a Square Meal. Of course they hastened to provide him with all that the inner sinner could desire, but he nevertheless took occasion to jab them with a moral pointed by the event. "Know, then" (said he), "that in order that you may permanently enjoy the light of a lamp, it is necessary occasionally to replenish the Oil."

Delinquents who renew at once will be spared the moral which their remissness might tempt us to draw.

A Little More Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetich, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to anything good.

For encouragement, and to be convinced that this missionary work is having the desired effect, read the letter of E. M. Montgomery, of Bluefield, W. Va., among the friendly letters on page 250 of this issue.

Mr. Putnam's Visit to England.

In the last London Freethinker Mr. Charles Watts thus announces the event of the season in English Freethought circles:

"I am pleased to inform the readers of the Freethinker that next month Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, the popular Freethought lecturer and writer of America, will visit England. He will sail from New York on April 24th, and he comes as president of all the nationally-organized Freethought societies of the United States. I have known Mr. Putnam for many years, and I have always found him as genial in private as he is able in public. Next to Colonel Ingersoll, Mr. Putnam is the most eloquent speaker upon the American Freethought platform; while, as a poet and writer, he has won a high reputation on the other side of the Atlantic. His last work, 'Four Hundred Years of Freethought,' which I have on sale for him, is a proof of his literary skill and industry. I should like him to have a good reception from the Secularists of this country.

"Mr. Putnam will remain with us about three months, and during that time he wishes to lecture in all our principal towns. I have undertaken to arrange his lecturing tour, and shall be glad, therefore, to hear from his friends throughout the country who are desirous of having the services of our American visitor. All applications for lectures from Mr. Putnam must be addressed to me at 81 Effra-road, Brixton, London, S. W."

And Mr. Foote, the president of the National Secular Society of England, hospitably adds:

"On another page our readers will find an announcement by Mr. Charles Watts with respect to Mr. Putnam's visit to England. We have not the pleasure of Mr. Putnam's personal acquaintance, though we look forward to it with much expectation; but we have no doubt that he is all Mr. Watts represents him to be, and we hope he will receive the warmest possible welcome from the Freethinkers of old England. Branches of the National Secular Society should communicate early with Mr. Watts in order to secure a visit from Mr. Putnam during his brief stay in this country."

Mr. J. W. Gott, who has sincerely flattered this journal by imitating its name, says in his last Bradford Truth Seeker:

"English Freethinkers will learn with delight that Mr.

Samuel Porter Putnam, the poet and brilliant American who has with such wonderful success vividly epitomized in one fine volume 'Four Hundred Years of Freethought,' has already determined to pay a visit to this country during the month of May. As Mr. Putnam is an eloquent speaker, as well as a ready and racy writer, we should very much like to hear that he has the intention of making a vigorous Freethought campaign through the principal towns of England. Such a procedure would be certain to greatly vitalize our movement, and intensify its importance. We would gladly do our share to crown a scheme of this nature with unmitigated success."

With this enthusiastic welcome Mr. Putnam is sure to do and get good from his visit to our comrades across the water, and the account he will send back to his friends who cannot go with him is also sure to be good. And attention is specially directed to the fact that only in THE TRUTH SEEKER of America will be found the glowing and accurate account of this trip. We mention this with a view to impressing upon the casual reader of this journal that he would better subscribe and become a regular reader, or he may miss some of these good things. And if he wants any more inducement than is herein set forth we call his attention to the special premium offer of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" with a year's subscription, provided he speaks quick and lets three silver dollars talk at the same time. Greenbacks will do, or even gold, if you have nothing better.

Our Great Premium Offer.

It is yet a little early for effective work to be done in getting new subscribers in response to the extraordinary offer of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" as a premium either to the new subscriber or to the friend who solicits the subscription, as elected between them, but quite a number have responded with one or two names for the paper, and have found it pretty easy to get them with this fresh inducement. The first to reach us was from Louis Roessler, who ordered the paper to a relative in Missouri. The second was the veteran Joseph Knauss, from a Military Home where the paper is not unknown but liked by a good many of the old soldiers who "fit" so hard that they are now unfit for work.

William Allen, a good Missouri friend, writes:

"Mr. Editor: I send you $3 for a new subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and I also let him have the benefit of the offer in the last paper of the 'Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book' as a premium. I will try to get another one next Sunday. I am not very well acquainted here yet, but I hope to get more subscribers soon. There are many Freethinkers here, but few take THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours for truth and progress."

F. A. Rahders, of North Dakota; Millard S. Teague, of Indiana, and L. A. LeMieux, of Wisconsin, also enroll themselves under this offer.

W. J. Ribley, of San Marcial, N. M., writes:

"I send you $6 for two new subscribers. I represented to them that they will get a $2 Picture Book, as I thought it would hold good for more as well as for one. I am doing the best I can to add to your list and intend to keep doing. You will find $2.50 also for the J. B. Wise case. Mrs. Mattie Freeman will lecture in our village May 7th, 8th, and 9th. Will you kindly so state in your notices of coming lectures? Please remember me to Mr. Putnam if you see him before he sails."

We are very grateful to Mr. Ribley, and assure him that his understanding of the offer is correct. Each of the new subscribers has ere this received his "Pictorial Text-Book," and we will wager a hat that each is pleased with both the book and the paper. Saying nothing of the Editor, we believe THE TRUTH SEEKER to be a mighty good paper, and one that will please all Freethinking men and women. And under the stimulus of this offer we ought to see its list of subscribing friends very greatly enlarged. J. J. Schreiber, of the old Bay state, says:

"Inclosed find $3 for one year's subscription and the 'Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book' as advertised in sample copy of April 6th. I am one of the most pronounced Freethinkers in this community, but being only a tradesman have not the influence of some; however, I am doing great work among the working people. I send you a list of names to whom you may send sample copies."

Mr. Yocky, of West Virginia, who has just received his first copy of the paper as a Trial Subscriber, immediately writes back that he wants to change his subscription to a yearly one and get the "Pictorial Book," a change which we are willing and pleased to make, of course.

Charles L. Brickell, of Montana, saw the offer and reached for his check book. He writes:

"Dear Sir: A copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER falling into my hands I hasten to take you up in your very Liberal offer. Inclosed find $3.40 for the paper and 'Pictorial Book,' and for the 'Bible Inquirer' and 'Age of Reason.' If money enough is not inclosed, trot things along and write me for more. If you can keep up to sample you ought to have five hundred thousand subscribers. I will do my mite."

Friend Brickell is ten cents short, but we will get that some other time. We are after those half million subscribers now, and shall trust to him for a few of them.

The J. B. Wise Case.

The report of the proceedings in this case arrived too late for insertion in this issue of the paper, but we shall print it next week.

The case was set down for trial on the 10th, and Attorney Bierck from this city was promptly on hand, as was Mr. Wise. The proceedings were short, as Mr. Bierck had some law questions he desired settled before there could be a trial before a jury, and he put in a demurrer and motion to quash the whole thing. The argument on these motions occupied less than an hour, and briefs were submitted for the consideration of Judge Foster. United States Attorney Perry made no argument opposing the motion, leaving the judge to handle the case without his assistance. Judge Foster reserved his decision, and will hand it down later in the term. Meanwhile, Mr. Wise's bailbond holds good, and if the decision is adverse, Mr. Perry agreed to continue the same bond for his appearance until the appeal can be argued before the Circuit Court, which convenes next fall at St. Louis, on which bench Judge Foster will not appear. It will be some time, therefore, before the Rev. Mr. Vennum will have the pleasure of seeing his theological antagonist behind the bars, and he will have to devise some other scheme to silence the Infidels.

If Mr. Wise shall finally be convicted, the Supreme Court of the United States will at the same time have to render a formal decision that the "Holy Bible" is an obscene book and not entitled to the privileges of the United States mail. This is not a prospect that will please the Christians greatly, but they have got themselves into the scrape, and it is not for the Infidels to let them out. If they can send their book through the mails, the Infidels must be accorded the same right, and they cannot, with our consent, close a religious argument by putting into jail the Infidel antagonist they cannot otherwise overcome. Neither can they prevent the Infidels from pointing out to them the parts of the Bible to which objection is made by shutting those Infidels in jail. Fair play is a jewel in religious discussion, and the inquisition methods are behind the times, however good a disposition the clergy have to put them again in force. And if the United States Supreme Court shall finally decide that the Bible is an obscene book, and that Mr. Wise is guilty of a crime in quoting from it, what will the Bible Society do? How many years will its officers and subscribers have to spend in prison to expiate their crimes? Who among them will be the cheerful sacrifice and offering for Christ's sake?

The prospect ahead of us is for a fight that will take some time and a good deal of money, but it will be worth all it costs. So far, the contributions have been less than the expenses, and THE TRUTH SEEKER was compelled to advance from its scanty resources some of the expenses of the attorney. Mr. Bierck, of course, cannot be asked to labor for nothing. His friendship for the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and his desire to see fair play for Mr. Wise in this matter will have a strong tendency to keep his fee bill down, but he has to live by the sweat of his legal brain. He has got the case into the best shape we could ask, and will be on hand every time to the end. We ask every Freethinker in the land, therefore, to come to Mr. Wise's aid in this case, as it is one of vital interest to us all. If the Infidel is to be put in jail for quoting the Bible in argument while the ministers can send millions of copies of it through the mail and go scot-free, let us annex Russia.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

BROUGHT FROM SCHOOL TO COURT

The Matter of Religious Instruction by State Paid Teachers.

A TEST CASE UP FROM WAVERLY, PA.

Services in the School After the Methodist Pattern—Visiting Clergymen Asked the Pupils if They Loved the Lord, and Rebuked Those Who Didn't—The Bible Read Responsively—Teacher and Directors Judicially Enjoined.

Judge Gunster, of the equity court of Lackawanna county, Pa., has decided that responsive Bible reading and the singing of devotional hymns constitute religious services and cannot be had in the public school. This is the story of the trial, which is not yet ended:

Waverly is a town or borough in Lackawanna county. The population is largely Protestant, consisting of the adherents of various denominations, with a slight sprinkling of Catholics. The principal of the Waverly Graded school, F. C. Hanyon, is a Methodist, and a very active one. Hence the present trouble. On March 20 George E. Stevenson, a member of the board of school directors, of Waverly, through his attorneys, John P. Kelly and E. C. Newcomb, applied to Judge Gunster for an injunction to restrain Mr. Hanyon from reading the Bible and conducting religious services in the school according to the customs of the Methodist Episcopal church. The injunction was granted and the hearing set for March 23. Truth, of Scranton, says:

Mr. Stevenson has two children attending the school. It does not appear from the petition that he is a member of any church. [What would his church affiliation, or non-affiliation, if known, have to do with the merits of the case? Is there the slightest reason why the citizen when beginning an action at law for the protection of his rights should state his religious beliefs?—Ed. T. S.] He is a prominent and prosperous citizen of Waverly and is well-known in this city. In his petition he states that F. C. Hanyon is principal of the school and exercises a general supervision over all of the grades, of which there are three. Mr. Stevenson says his religious views, conscience, and convictions differ from the Methodist Episcopal church, and that among the children attending the Waverly school, and under charge of the defendant are those of the Roman Catholic faith and of various denominations of Protestants.

THE AFFIDAVIT OF MR. STEVENSON.

I am the complainant in this case, and the facts are as follows: During the past winter some agitation arose in the district of Waverly borough in connection with special religious meetings that were held nightly, first in the Methodist church for a period of about two weeks, and immediately thereafter for another period of about the same length of time at the Baptist church. The defendant took an active interest in these religious services, commonly called revival meetings. It became known to me and to the other school directors that he had introduced at the opening of our public school, of which he was principal, a sort of religious service. In order that the propriety of such service might be passed upon by the board of directors, I caused a resolution to be offered at a special meeting held on the date of March 1, 1895, that we as a board of directors adopt the scriptures as a text-book to be used in the public school. The resolution was rejected by a unanimous vote. Afterwards, the religious exercises of which I complain were continued and still do continue in our school. I visited the school on the first day of March in order to have personal knowledge of the character of these services.

The school was called to order at 9 o'clock in the morning, being the opening hour established by immemorial usage in that vicinity for the opening of the public schools. The defendant opened the school with Bible reading in the following manner: He read the first verse of the thirty-second Psalm, to which the pupils responded by reading the second verse in unison, and in that manner the defendant and the pupils proceeded through the entire Psalm, reading alternate verses. The defendant then required the pupils to repeat from memory in concert the first Psalm, after which these particular exercises closed with singing, by the school, of a well-known devotional hymn from "The Pentecostal Hymnal."

REVIVAL METHODS USED.

My information is from various of the pupils attending the school, among whom are two of my own children, aged respectively seven and nine years, that the same form of religious exercises has been uniformly practiced from that time ever since, and for a long time prior thereto. I am further informed, and it is generally known in the district, that one Rev. J. L. Thomas, the clergyman who conducted the so-called revival meetings at the Methodist church above spoken of, visited the school in the month of December last; that while there, having been requested by the defendant to address the pupils, he did so, making a religious address; upon the conclusion of which he made the same demand or request that is always made at so-called revival meetings in the Methodist church, viz., that all those pupils who loved the Lord should signify it by uplifted hands. Several of the pupils then raised their hands and others did not. Thereupon the reverend gentleman proceeded to rebuke or reproach those who had failed to make the requested sign by asking them if, down in their hearts, they did not feel ashamed or sorry for their conduct in so failing to lift up their hands, as he had requested, together with comments of like tenor.

The pupils in attendance at our public school range from the age of six years up to eighteen years, and are about one hundred in number, of which I should say about one-third would be under nine years of age, one-third from nine to thirteen years, and the balance from thirteen to eighteen years of age. They are the children of families of various religious faith, the greater part of various Protestant denominations, but a few of them are of the Roman Catholic faith and are being brought up and educated in that faith. These religious exercises are especially offensive to the parents of these Catholic pupils. The mother of these children being unable to reconcile herself to these exercises being participated in by her children, has instructed her children not to participate in the exercises, not to commit portions of the scriptures to memory, nor to recite such portions of scripture in accordance with the defendant's request. I have counseled this mother to rescind that instruction upon the ground that it tended to impair and destroy the discipline that ought to be preserved in the public schools.

These exercises have excited a degree of curiosity and inquiry on the part of many of these young children attending our school, and in my opinion they are breeding a spirit and disposition of controversy of the pupils from their legitimate studies and from the several text-books that have been adopted by the board of directors, and that in many ways the effect of this practice is demoralizing and injurious to the best interests of our public schools.

Truth states that for two months previous to the opening of the legal battle the conduct of Mr. Hanyon had been causing considerable excitement in Waverly borough. It also says that Mr. Stevenson is an Agnostic and secretary of the board.

The attendance at the hearing was large, including "several gentlemen with clerical coats and white cravats." The defendant was represented by Hannah, Dean, and Hulslander & Vosburg, attorneys. Judge Gunster asked Attorney Newcomb, of the prosecution, "What control has a court of equity over a teacher?" The attorney answered that the case upon which they would rely "came up on mandamus proceedings compelling the discontinuance of the Bible as a text-book in public schools." In reply to the judge's further question why the directors did not stop it, Mr. Newcomb said the principle contended for was that involved in the Gallitzin case. In that case the court made the injunction perpetual as to the use in the schools of a catechism of the Catholic church. The teacher, as the attorney claimed, is a quasi public officer, and if he does anything contrary to the constitution the remedy is against him.

Mr. Hannah, of counsel for the defendant, contended that the injunction was an effort to govern the school by one director and a court of common pleas. If Principal Hanyon is violating the law or the constitution, he held that the board of directors are neglecting their duty. To the directors is committed the entire control of the schools and if an injunction was granted it would simply mean that the court would be assisting the directors to do their duty. The powers of the board are ample, and it is their duty to discharge the teacher if he fails in his duty. Several facts, he said, were also in dispute.

This is a characteristic piece of theocratic sophistry. It says, in effect, that no matter how much the teacher may violate the constitution, he is all right so long as the majority of the school board sanctions his usurpations, regardless of the inhibitions of the fundamental law. The defense now prepared their demurrer.

The demurrer was on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction; that the directors were not joined in the action; that the proceedings would take direct control of the teacher from the school board, and that an injunction was not the proper means to obtain the relief sought.

At the same time the prosecution amended their bill so as to join three of the directors with the principal as defendants and Directors G. E. Stevenson and Rev. D. N. Vail as prosecutors. Lawyer Hannah argued that Waverly is a Christian community and that the reading of the Bible is universal throughout the state and the country and Europe. He also held that there is no Methodist way of reading the Bible, and that it was not shown by the affidavit that the services were of a Methodist character. The hymn book used was an ordinary singing book furnished by the board. It was admitted that a minister had done in the school as charged by the affiant, but he asserted that the teacher did not know that he would do as he did when he invited him to speak. (The idea of a preacher neglecting such an opportunity as that!) Mr. Kelly, in his rejoinder, made a very gratifying showing for the schools of Lackawanna county, considering the fact that Lackawanna county is in Covenanter Pennsylvania. He said that it was not true that the bible was universally read in the public schools of the state. According to the report of County Superintendent Taylor, of the 212 schools in Scranton, the Bible was read in but 111. It is not read in any of the thirty-five schools of Carbon-dale nor in the thirty-one schools of Dunmore. In the 147 schools outside of these cities it is not read. Mr. Kelly quoted the Wisconsin decision, in which it was held that the Bible could not be read in the schools without violating the constitution, and he said that the constitutions of the two states are almost identical. He claimed that in the present case it was shown that not only was the Bible—a sectarian book—read in the schools, but that services were held according to a prescribed formula. Mr. Newcomb proved from decisions that the Bible—the King James version—is a sectarian book. He was sure that if the court would permit counsel to go into the facts of the case it would be astounded and shocked at the condition of affairs as they exist in the borough. It was monstrous to rebuke children of tender years because they would not hold up their hands when asked by a Methodist minister if they loved the Lord. (We should say that it was monstrous that pupils of any age should be asked any question regarding religious dogmas, by any minister or by anybody else, when at school.)

On April 1 Judge Gunster handed down his decision in regard to the demurrer of Principal Hanyon. After reciting the material allegations in the plaintiff's bill, the judge said:

The defendants having demurred to the bill of complaint, we must, under the established rule of procedure, treat the allegations contained therein as if they were true. The only question left for consideration, therefore, is simply and purely one of law and on that question there is no room for doubt. It is too plain for argument that denominational religious exercises and instructions in sectarian doctrine have no place in our system of common school education. They are not only not authorized by any law, common or statutory, but are expressly prohibited and forbidden by our constitution, the fundamental law of the commonwealth.

The public schools are supported by taxes collected from the public without regard to the creed or denomination of the taxpayer. The general assembly is required by the constitution to provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools, wherein all the children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated and to appropriate at least $1,000,000 each year for that purpose.

Section 2 of Article X. provides that no money raised for the support of the public schools of the commonwealth shall be appropriated to or used for the support of any sectarian school. Section 3 of Article I. declares that all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience, and no preference shall ever be given, by law, to any religious establishments or mode of worship.

By the act of May 8, 1854, P. L. 623, the school directors or controllers of every district are required annually to determine the amount of school taxes which shall be levied on their districts for the ensuing year, which shall, together with such additional sums as the district may be entitled to receive out of the state appropriation and from other sources, be sufficient and necessary to keep the schools of the district in operation not less than five nor more than ten months in the year. They are charged with the general supervision over the schools of their respective districts, have the appointment of all the teachers and fixing the amount of teachers' salaries, and are required to direct what branches of learning shall be taught in each school. By the twenty-fifth section of said act they are required at a meeting with the teachers of their respective districts held immediately after the annual election of teachers to "select and decide upon a series of school books, in the different branches, to be taught during the ensuing school year; which books and no other shall be used in the schools of the district during such period." These powers given to, and duties imposed upon, school directors and controllers, must necessarily be exercised and performed within the constitutional prohibition, and the public welfare requires that they should be rendered and performed within the spirit as well as the letter of the law. It is to the credit of those who have been charged with the duty of carrying our school laws into effect, the teachers as well as the directors and controllers, that there has been very little cause of complaint on that score. If it be true, as charged in the bill, that Mr. Hanyon is conducting sectarian or denominational religious exercises with the pupils under his charge, whether these exercises be according to the form of the Methodist Episcopal church or of any other church, he ought to discontinue doing so, and it is the duty of the directors, if the abuse exists, to see to it that it is eradicated at once.

Upon which Truth comments:

The opinion practically says that the Bible must not be read in the Waverly school. The demurrer which Judge Gunster overrules held that the court had no jurisdiction to restrain Principal Hanyon, but that the school directors alone was the power to regulate the reading of the Bible in the school. The Bible, the defendants held, is not a sectarian or denominational book. The facts of the case were not inquired into at all, so that the decision is purely on questions of law. The question will now come up on the facts on final hearing for an injunction.

An indignation meeting was called in Waverly to protest against the action of Mr. Stevenson. Most of the speakers were "reverends" and "elders," as was to have been expected. Resolutions were unanimously adopted expressive of the confidence of the meeting in the character of Professor Hanyon as a teacher and "Christian gentleman," and calling upon Mr. Stevenson to cease his war upon the Bible in the school or resign his position as director. A subscription was started to raise funds to defray the expenses of the legal fight, and liberal contributions were made. "We were then dismissed with the benediction," says the secretary in his report. They may dismiss Mr. Stevenson from his position without the benediction because he is too true a patriot to consent to the adulterous union of religion and public education, but it will avail them nothing in the end—the state and the church must be completely separate. Commenting editorially on the decision of Judge Gunster, Truth says:

The opinion of Judge Gunster in the Waverly case emphasizes the fact that under the Constitution, and the acts of Assembly in conformity therewith, there can be no sectarian teaching in the public schools of this commonwealth. The opinion makes this point so clear as to bring it within the comprehension of the most ordinary intelligence, and leaves no room for a misunderstanding of their duties on the part of teachers or school directors.

It is well that there should be a complete and thorough understanding of this matter. The temptation to introduce religious instruction into the public schools is one that under certain conditions is rather difficult to resist, but until all who pay school taxes agree as to what this instruction shall be, and the state constitution is altered in accordance therewith, it cannot be made a part of the educational system of the state. This view of the case is vindicated clearly and forcibly in Judge Gunster's opinion and fortified by the constitution and the school laws of the commonwealth.

The Scranton Tribune takes the opposite view, holding with Superintendent Brooks of the Philadelphia schools that the Bible must not be banished from the public institutions of learning, but both editor and superintendent declare that there should be no "sectarian" instruction! Whom do they fool by this attempt to ride two horses at once? The reader will find on the editorial pages some excerpts from their deliverances.

The Cause in Oregon.

The Oregon plan of organization is not only attracting the attention of Secularists all over the country, but Christians who come in contact with it fear it. They are realizing that they will have to find something more attractive than their present methods to keep the children in their Sunday-school. It is amusing to note how astonished they are that "Infidels" can have Sunday-schools. "Why, what do you teach?" I am often asked. They seem to think that without God and the Bible it would be impossible to have a Sunday-school, and no wonder they are astonished when they visit ours. One of the pious Christians of Silverton inquired of another what we do there. The answer was, "Why, they do almost everything; they even stand on their heads!"

Our last entertainment given by the Silverton school is worthy of mention. Its chief feature was an operetta in two acts, entitled, "Seven Old Ladies of Lavender Town; or, Prof. Lightning Haskins's Wax Works," by eight girls and eight boys from ten to thirteen years of age. Their acting and singing astonished everybody, and they won great applause. A character song, "I am a Pedler," by Messrs. Ramsby, Wiles, and Towne, was unique and well rendered, while Pearl W. Geer got rounds of applause for his story of the woman "whose shoes were full of feet." I recited Stephenson's poem, "Our Father in Heaven," and in response to a recall gave "Pyramus and Thisbe." The last number, "A Good-night Drill" by eight little girls, was perfect. The success of the entertainment was mainly due to the work of Miss Sophie Wolf and Mrs. E. L. Smith. A dance followed the exercises, and a gratifying sum was realized for the Sunday-school. The Silverton people are justly proud of their school. Miss Wolf and L. Ames are the efficient teachers of the most interesting division, the Froebel Group of twenty-five members from three to eight years of age; Miss Bender of the Wixon Group; Mrs. J. D. Guiss of the Slenker Group; J. D. Guiss of the Progressiv Bible Class. These are ex-school-teachers. E. L. Smith, of the Paine Group, is the popular railroad agent of this place, and he is assisted by Hon. T. W. Davenport, ex-state senator and father of Harry Davenport, the gifted artist of the San Francisco Examiner. The whole family of Davenports, from grandparents to grandchildren, are talented either as artists, musicians, writers, or singers. I would match Silverton with any place in the country for brainy men and women, pretty girls, earnest, noble young men, and bright children. Silverton is a Secular town and has been for years, and there is nothing like the atmosphere of Secularism to develop brain and body.

Since my last report the Wagner, Or., Secular Sunday-school has been organized, with thirty-five members and the following officers: Wm. Crabtree, superintendent; Robt. Carsner, secretary; Maud Carsner, treasurer and librarian. The choir is composed of Mrs. Crabtree, Mrs. Purdin, Miss Cason, and Messrs. Hugh Purdin, E. and G. Hayden, Geo. Wagner, F. Hunt, and Orson Martin. By a letter from the secretary I am informed that the Christian Sunday-school has about "ten regular attendants." I have accepted an invitation to deliver the Fourth of July oration at Wagner, and want to correspond with Secularists along the route with a view to arranging for lectures and organizing Secular Sunday-schools wherever I lecture, and will come prepared with constitutions, instructions, songs, poems, lessons, etc., and you will know how to conduct a Secular Sunday-school before I leave. Please write at once, so that all arrangements can be made. I may also extend my trip to Harney county, and hope to hear from some of the friends there. Don't write and tell me "there are only a few Liberals and we are afraid we cannot make a success of the school." You can make a success of it. All that is required is a little energy, for the expense is small. We want not less than a hundred Secular Sunday-schools in Oregon before our next annual convention. The Secularists of Oregon will be glad to know that C. B. Reynolds has been granted a license to lecture under the auspices of the Oregon Secular Union.

At the last quarterly meeting of the executive committee licenses to the following named lecturers were renewed: Annie E. Barker, Nettie A. Olds, and Katie Kehm Smith. Blank forms for quarterly reports of lecturers and superintendents of Sunday-schools were adopted. The uniform price of $1 per month to each Secular Sunday-school for its lessons, etc., was fixed, and regulations in regard to appointment and resignation of lecturers were prescribed. Miss Olds was assigned to the Portland circuit, Mrs. Barker to the Forest Grove, and Katie Kehm Smith to the Silverton circuit. Mr. Reynolds will try to organize a circuit at Astoria, Or., and another at Vancouver, Wash.

The following donations have been received by the Oregon State Secular Union: John Leitch, Mazo Manie, Wis., $3; Warren Carsner, Wagner, Or., $1.50; Portland Secular Sunday-school, 50 cents; Silverton, $2; Martin Miller, Dayton, Or., $1; Emil Knips, Adrian, Mich., $1. Remedy for Political Ills.

The man who finds himself smothering under falling ruins may live just long enough to realize his lack of prudence in not taking better care of the house his father built. Our fathers who framed the federal Constitution builded wisely, but have the children preserved the structure? The framers fortified it against sordid, selfish attack from without and from dishonest leaks. Now can it be saved, or is it already a ruin?

Fairly interpreted, the Constitution forbids class legislation or favoritism on the plea of protection; forbids the extravagance of paying more for government service than like service commands elsewhere; forbids the many relief bills passed by Congress every year; forbids even the raising of millions of dollars annually to pension a multitude of doubtful patriots; forbids legislation in support of or interference with any form of religion; forbids meddling or paternal legislation. By it the people were left free in liberty and in the pursuit of happiness.

In theory the federal government is little more than a clerkship to perform certain specific duties. In practice it has become meddling, officious, costly, beyond that of any other nation. Its eight-hour law has caused innumerable strikes. Its protective policy, while increasing wages spasmodically, promotes trusts and monopolies, and attracts multitudes from foreign lands to scramble for the spasmodic wages. Its patent system creates monopolies and is bad. When the Coxey army was moving on to Washington Senator Sherman rose in his place and said, "The remedy is near at hand; the Pullman patents will soon expire." That tells the story. The government employs chaplains and exempts church property from taxation; thereby meddling with religious matters and robbing those who believe in some other kind of priestcraft or in none at all. To execute the multitude of infringing laws requires a host of offensive officials and entails enormous cost.

Thomas Paine says: "A republic proves its excellence by the small quantity of taxes it requires." For the year 1781 the Congress estimated the sum required at $8,000,000, and fixed the proportion each state should pay. Were Spiritualism true, and the immortal Paine could and should visit this land for a day or two and witness the present discord, corruption, and extravagance, would he recognize the individual sovereign of the past? Might he not wring his spirit hands and cry, "O fools! was it in vain that I hoped and labored to make a nation flowing with common sense and reason?"

Now where is the fault and the remedy? Primarily, the citizens themselves are responsible for the bad condition of things. As a rule they vote for the sharper in the hope of personal or party gain. Single-handed, or in cliques, through lobbying and bribing, laws are enacted for the very purpose of helping the sharper to get the better of his simple neighbor. The millionaire is often denounced, sometimes threatened; while, as a rule, he obtains wealth in obedience to, and perhaps favored by, laws that are unconstitutional. But each one wants some law to regulate everybody else. Petitioning for and making laws has become a national disease. There is a general hankering for laws to help some folks and to restrain the rest. The average legislator, on taking the sacred oath of office, fancies a sudden influx of divine wisdom that fits him like a Moses to lead the people into a wilderness. And the common mind fancies a divine halo in the law passed by the nation's sages, however bad the law is.

The great trouble is, the proper relation between the people and the government has been reversed. In theory, the people are to sustain an administration in the performance of its constitutional functions. But there are multitudes now claiming that the government should, in part at least, sustain them; and when the party in office fails to satisfy them they vote it out, in the hope that a change will bring them some favor. In all the general elections during twelve years past, the growing numbers who fail to support themselves or to obtain help in some form from government, have voted for change and chance; and each time entertained the notion that they had saved the country.

When a man is hit by a brick he naturally looks to see whence it came; but most men in this country are either too selfish or too dazed to perceive that most of the discord and trouble in the land may be traced to bad, meddling laws.

Drinking, playing, betting, Sundaying, believing, worshipping, toiling, trading, are not proper subjects of legislation in a free country.

The best, perhaps the only remedy, is to stop enacting unconstitutional laws and to repeal all existing ones. Instead of tinkering and amending bad laws as things too sacred to be destroyed, they should be abolished altogether. The country might survive the burden of paying salaries to the armies of legislators, if such armies, instead of trying like a Joshua to reverse natural laws, would retreat within constitutional limitations.

Were the federal and all state legislators to take this advice, fewer courts and officials would be required, the burden of taxation greatly lessened, equality of condition promoted, and there would be no excuse for Populism, Socialism, or Anarchism. Then the people might get hold of the right end of political economy; and by giving more attention to the laws of health, both of body and mind, have little need of the doctor, still less of the lawyer, and none at all of the priest. L. G. REED.

Observations.

President Cleveland, who is responsible equally with Congress for the passage of the income tax bill into a law, has not paid his own share of the tax at this writing. On the contrary, he appeals to the commissioner of internal revenue to decide whether he is not exempted by the constitutional provision that the compensation of the president "shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he may have been elected." No one not desirous of dodging his taxes would raise that question, but as every one dodges his taxes if he can, I expect that all public officials whose salary is above $4,000 will think it relevant, competent, and material. It is not, though, for taxation belongs to the expense account, and diminishes the salary only in the way that an increase of the revenue tax on whisky, tobacco, oleomargarine, etc., would have that result. And in the case of these our salary doesn't have to be $4,000 in order that the most of us may be mulcted.

If it is true, as Moreh Nebuchim tells us, that the Bible writers teach the existence of only one god, and if their teaching is put forward as the doctrine of the ancient Jews, then that people are totally misrepresented by their biographers. The Higher Critics inform us that the religion of the Hebrews was "a motley polytheism;" that "they believed in sacred stones and trees, and worshiped the powers of nature." "Though Yahweh was always the chief god," we are told, "all kinds of Baals were worshiped by his side, even by zealous contenders for his honor." David "invoked the Baals, and sometimes made frightful offerings to avert the wrath of Yahweh." Solomon set up sanctuaries for the heathen gods as well as for the home product. The prophets, five hundred years after Moses, had not reached a clear perception of the one-god idea. This information, which my dilatory advent among historians prevented me from obtaining at first hand,

I get from Doctors Oort, Hooykaas, and Kuenen, authors of "The Bible for Learners." In other matters Rabbi Nebuchim does not support accepted authorities. For example, the writer who touches off the Hebrew language for the "Encyclopedia Britannica" notes that in the Pentateuch the same form is used for both masculine and feminine genders; that very little is known about the changes which the language has undergone; that it was practically dead long before the time of Christ, and that "in general it may be said that the biblical text supplies inadequate data for studying the history of the language." It was with a knowledge of this fact that I remarked that the study of the Bible as it is to-day could not make anyone certain that he had caught the writers' meaning. Mr. Nebuchim's use of the pronoun "she" in translating the Hebrew word "ruah," meaning "spirit," illustrates the confusion which the grammarians have caused by teaching students of our language that English words have gender. I am led to infer that Hebrew words, like the Greek, the Latin, the German, and some others, are endowed by their creators with a certain variation of form called gender, of which Anglo-Saxon may be considered as devoid. A word in our tongue may indicate a male or a female, but it has no gender of its own. "Ruah," therefore, unless it means a female spirit, should have the pronoun "it," and not "she." The absence of the neuter in Hebrew may have led Mr. Nebuchim into error; and the same difficulty appears where he calls a nation "him," and not "them" like other translators. To recur to the original proposition, that the Bible writers knew of only one deity, and admitting that in the first chapter of Genesis the Elohim availed themselves of the editorial "us" and "we," will the learned Nebuchim accommodate us with a translation of Genesis iii, 22? In English it now reads, "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man has become as one of us." Here the editorial "us" cannot be resorted to, for that word implies no more than "the editor," and "one of the editor" is not a permissible expression.

I regard Nebuchim as a valuable addition to Freethought literature, and look forward to much personal edification from his communications. I should be particularly interested to know whence he derived his highly imaginative definition of the name "Jehovah."

The Canadian government recently appropriated one thousand dollars to buy masses for the repose of the late Sir John Thompson's soul. A few years ago, in the case of a Brooklyn man, who left a considerable sum to the church for the saying of masses for a like purpose, and whose will was contested by his heirs, the judge decided that he could not legally award any amount to the benefit of a person whose whereabouts was unknown to the court. The course taken by the Canadian legislature is less agreeable not only to common sense but to justice, especially as the money appropriated was not a portion of the defunct Mr. Thompson's estate, but belonged in part to people who regard that form of incantation called the mass as a heathenish superstition.

The World last Saturday had this item of intelligence among its dispatches:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., April 12th.—People who were out late last night report seeing a very beautiful and peculiar celestial phenomenon in the shape of a cross formed by the moon's rays, with the moon as a center. It was plainest about midnight, just as good Friday was being ushered in.

Unless those who witnessed this phenomenon were deleteriously affected by it, the incident is not so powerful an argument against staying out late at night as some others that could be advanced.

I have a second letter from the individual who subscribes himself "Jesus Christ Alive," and it removes some misapprehensions into which I was led by the tone of his previous epistle. He is a survival of a biblical type, perhaps, but not of Jesus Christ. His style of communication, as developed under criticism, fails to connect him with the Nazarene, though if reincarnation is granted to donkeys there would be nothing unreasonable in his identification as Balaam's ass.

For the reason that the Christian church does a considerable business, mainly on capital furnished by the state, in outcasts, orphans, paupers, etc., the conclusion has been hastily reached that there must be some inherent good in the institution. The history, creeds, and conduct otherwise of the church is opposed to such a theory, for to be really charitable is to be tolerant, and the church has not that virtue. She has "homes" for the incapables, but penitentiaries for those who do not share her whims. The explanation of this may be discovered in the analogy between the church member and the object of his solicitude. The church itself is a retreat for the mentally dependent. Others, competent to face the truth as it is in this world, have no more need for the consolations of religion than the physically able have for its dole of alms. The church member, therefore, is in pathological and congenital sympathy with the class of incompetents for whose possession he contends and for whom he solicits aid. The "charitable" institution and the church are twins—the one being an asylum for the corporeally feeble or dependent, the other for individuals similarly deficient as to their intellects.

This view is supported by the cant phrase, generally found in Thanksgiving proclamations, to the effect that our dependence on the almighty should teach us charity toward those less favored than ourselves in a worldly way.

A week ago I recorded in these columns the case of an Italian boy whose testimony was rejected in a law court on his confession that he knew nothing about God. A more satisfactory witness has since appeared before one of our legal tribunals. His name was Cokely and he kissed the book with a cross on it. It is not presumable that the court itself could have added to his theological lore, but when the judge inquired of him if he was acquainted with the "Encyclopedia Britannica" he replied with some pride that he was an Irishman and not in the habit of associating with dagoes. The latinity of the title of the work led him to infer, erroneously, that an Italian party was referred to, and when he learned that the statements of said Britannica contradicted his own, he boldly added the epithet "liar" to that of dago and expressed a desire to meet the opposing witness outside. To his great indignation, however, the "dago's" authority was accepted instead of his oath. If knowledge of an object were always proportionate to the extent it is in evidence to the senses, or even to the reason and understanding, Mr. Cokely's lack of acquaintance with the British encyclopedia would be a funnier circumstance than Francesco Mazetti's ignorance of the American deity. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Freethought and Secular News from England.

Since sending you my last "Notes" we have had an active time in England. The theological bigots have been using all their resources in the endeavor to regain a portion of their lost power. The vulgar and debased advocates of Christianity, finding they could not defeat us in argument, have resorted to the basest falsehood and the vilest imputations, for which they have received their just punishment; the opponents of secular education have been doing their best to further impede the advancement of true instruction in our board schools, and the National Secular Society has been as vigorous as ever in fighting the battle of Freethought and in expounding the principles of Secularism, both in London and in the provincial towns. Unfortunately the demon Influenza has been busy, with its enervating influence upon many of us. Medical science seems to be powerless to discover either the cause of this fiendish invader of health or its remedy. It is no respecter of persons, for rich and poor, believers and unbelievers, have been among its victims, although the latter, as far as my knowledge extends, have successfully resisted its attacks, while those to whom it proved fatal were Christians.

CHRISTIAN RASCALITY.—The National Secular Society, under the able leadership of its president, Mr. G. W. Foote, has recently succeeded in exposing and legally punishing certain vulgar and unprincipled Christians on account of the publication of a most infamous libel in reference to the Hall of Science, London. The details of the charge made by these shameless expounders of "the pure gospel" are unfit to be given here; it is sufficient to say that Secularists were accused of teaching youths an offense that is as "unnatural" as it is degrading. Of course there was not a shadow of truth in the charge, and after a thorough exposure in a court of law the verdict was given against these pious specimens of human depravity, and for their audacious and unscrupulous lying they were publicly condemned and had to pay, including costs, £250, or one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. As I sat in court and witnessed the miserable cowardice manifested by these hypocritical and canting expounders of a "pure and undefiled religion," and listened to the palpable lying they indulged in, I felt more convinced than ever before that an influence superior to that which Christianity exercises was needed to inspire within some minds a sense of decency and a love of truth.

THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.—The pious bigots of the London school board have resumed their reac-inary policy in opposing all progressive plans in our national scheme of education. At the meeting of the board the other day it was proposed to abolish the fees in the evening continuation schools. The orthodox party of course opposed such a concession to the people with the extraordinary argument that the children who attended night schools were those who were necessitated to go to work to assist their parents, and had left school to earn money and could therefore well afford to pay for their evening instruction! The motion was rejected by 26 to 24 votes. The religious fanatics also persist in refusing to rescind the obnoxious circular which they issued for the purpose of enforcing upon the teachers certain theological restrictions. Fortunately a liberal spirit is growing on the board and we have many indications that the days of orthodox supremacy there are numbered.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM.—The news that friend Putnam will visit England the latter part of April has been received here with unqualified delight. Every effort will be made to give him a hearty welcome, and to make his visit as successful as possible. Personally I am looking forward to see my old friend and colleague in this country with the greatest of pleasure. I regard him, next to Colonel Ingersoll, as the greatest orator in the ranks of American Freethought lecturers. All that can be done, Mr. Foote and myself will do, to give the Freethinkers of great Britain an opportunity of listening to the eloquence of the president of the Secular Union and of the Freethought Federation of America.

CONTROVERSIAL ACTIVITY.—For many years the clergy of this country have persistently avoided public discussions with the representatives of Freethought. And even now the Christian Evidence Society will not officially encourage debates upon religious topics. Still, there is a certain amount of renewed activity among individual controversialists. Since my return from America I have been kept fairly well at public discussions, and now my colleague, Mr. G. W. Foote, is having his turn. At the present time he has about six debates under consideration. Well, the more the better for the success of Secularism.

"PEACE AND GOODWILL."—The boast that Christianity promotes peace and love does not appear to be verified by the present warlike preparations in "Christian Europe." In those very countries where the Christian faith is paraded the most we find more reliance placed upon the instruments of war than upon the force of the teachings of the gospel. For instance, the British navy now costs fifty per cent more than it did ten years ago, and that cost is still increasing. Last year we added to the annual vote for our navy some £3,000,000. This year we add not far from £1,500,000. And besides this we raise a loan on thirty years' terminable annuities of close upon £9,000,000. The estimates for our army have also nearly doubled during the last twelve years. Thus while vast sums of money are wasted in connection with the church and the military establishments of this "Christian" country, we have the deplorable spectacle of millions of able-bodied men out of employment, and thousands of helpless mortals suffering for the want of food and numbers dying every week through sheer starvation. What with an increasing pauperism, the clergy monopolizing wealth, and the aristocracy preventing the land from being used for the public good, we have much to be truly thankful for in this God-fearing nation.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?—Certain it is that the existing inequalities between the rich and poor, and the bitter conflicts now going on in the United Kingdom between capital and labor, cannot continue without being accompanied by the gravest consequences. Parliament has tried after a fashion to grapple with the evils, but its success hitherto has not been great. A committee was recently appointed by the House of Commons to inquire into the causes of and to suggest a remedy for the prevailing poverty, but up to date no practical results have been achieved. True, the committee have issued their interim report, but they express regret that they are unable to recommend any steps which are calculated to meet the acknowledged urgency of the case, such as Parliament would be likely to endorse. It is evident from the tone of the report, as well as from the admissions it contains, that the committee realize something of the magnitude and urgency of the unemployed problem. The evidence collected shows that there is a huge mass of helpless misery caused independently of the special influences of an exceptional winter. CHAS. WATTS.

News and Notes.

After wide wanderings over the continent it is refreshing to draw up at Boston, the ancient city of the Puritans. It has a massive orthodox appearance, but nevertheless Freethought illuminates its modern splendor. It is growing more vast and beautiful every time I visit its far-winding thoroughfares. But the churches are giving way to magnificent theaters and hotels, and this is a luminous sign of the times. The Public Library building is a structure which fills the heart with dreams of delight, blazoned as it is with memories of the past, of thoughts and deeds illustrious, and shining like a glorious portal into the world's advancing future. The Union passenger station, from which more trains depart each day than from any other station the world over, is a marvel of stupendous architecture and immense traveling facilities. It covers eleven acres—a metropolis in itself of ever-changing multitudes. The new subway will beat the devil all to pieces for subterranean activities and the tumults of pandemonium, newspaper and otherwise. Boston is really passing through a somewhat revolutionary epoch. The quaint old city is disappearing; the cow-paths are broadening to stately avenues, and tall and splendid edifices replace the landmarks of a century. Of course the Paine Memorial Building rears its sturdy walls amidst these enormous changes. The battlements of Freethought welcome the onward march of humanity. I give two addresses to the pioneers of this glorious outpost. The first was on that important issue, "Rome or Reason—Which?" and it was welcomed with ringing applause. In fact, I do not know of any words of mine that ever met with warmer approval. This shows that our ranks are alive to the impending danger. There is no compromise. Protestantism is thoroughly illogical. Its sole authority is the Bible, which is being dashed to pieces by modern criticism. Rome does not rely upon the Bible, but upon the divine authority of the church itself. The Bible, according to Rome, supplements and emphasizes the authority of the church, but does not create it. Rome is intrenched in a vast and powerful institution, and hence its strength. Only science and Freethought can overthrow its prestige and preserve the liberties of mankind.

My second address was on "Christianity and Woman," a very interesting subject, both as regards the past and the future of human development. Shelley says:

Poets are cradled into poetry by wrong,
And learn in suffering what they teach in song.

If the knowledge and discipline of woman are to be measured by her suffering, she certainly deserves the crown to day. But judging by the Women's Christian Temperance Union the "softer sex" has become so used to her chains, and hugs them so, that it has become exceedingly dangerous to grant her the ballot. If she gets the franchise she may cut our throats with it, as one critic remarked. The church has not only stripped woman of her natural right and dignity, but has demoralized her very being. She kisses the hand that strikes. The lines of the poet apply to church and woman:

The Church a monster of so foul a mien,
That to be hated needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with its face,
She'll first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I stated in my lecture that were I positively sure that woman, if granted suffrage, would vote God into the Constitution, I should oppose woman suffrage. I do not propose to give the servitors of the church a club with which to beat out my brains. It may be wrong to refuse woman the ballot, but it is a far greater wrong for woman to use the ballot to reinstate the old tyranny of church and state. I choose the lesser wrong, and no Freethinker can choose otherwise. The ballot, after all, is but a minor factor in the immense and progressive civilization of man. Woman need not wait for the ballot to be her best and noblest. I rather think the majority of my audience accepted the points I made.

I had to spend most of my time while in Boston seeing friends, for there is a goodly array of Liberals here. I visited the delightful homes of the Rush Brothers. They are now married, and they do not dream of any heaven beyond this sunny earth itself and the light of the hearthstone, where the graces and the loves prevail. Long life and happiness to these merry and busy friends, who know how to rustle for a happy fortune. Of course I foregathered with M. T. Rush and wife about the hospitable table. I wish my jolly English comrade was going with me over across the seas to his native land, to make me more familiar with its wonderful scenes.

The street-cars of Boston are like a Chinese puzzle, or rather like the wind, or Holy Ghost, of which Jesus spake, for surely who can tell whence they come or whither they go, as you stand with inquiring look at Scollay Square? However, I plunged in and took a car that I thought was going in the direction of Washburn's, and I really did get within a mile of his residence, and walked that distance a wiser if not a sadder man. I got there at last, and had a fine time with our eloquent advocate and his charming family. I understand he is on the road to wealth, which I do most potently hope to be true; but still we cannot dispense with his brilliant services in the Freethought lecture field, where fame is plenty though shekels are few. I am sure there is no one in our ranks who can do more good work than Washburn, and I hope his path to fortune will shine with the laurels of freedom. I also traveled to fair Melrose, where Ernest Mendum and his wife make smooth and attractive the pathway of reform. Music lent its charms to the occasion. Mrs. Mendum has a fine musical gift, and the Secular Pilgrim enjoyed the exquisite melodies which kindle the heart and fling the light of golden imagination. Friend Mendum is determined to keep the flag of the Investigator flying and make Paine Hall the rallying-place of the Liberal army. I hope that differences of method will not destroy the harmony that should exist among leaders of the "forlorn hope."

I had a jaunt also to Milford, and the Freethought friends at this point made a delightful reception—Mrs. Florence Johnson and her daughters, Pearl, Bertha, and Olive; Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Buxton and their daughter Pearl, and C. C. Johnson, who has traveled far and wide and has the enthusiasm of Freethought from head to foot. The trio of daughters are charming violin players and whiled away the hours with beautiful strains, while Miss Pearl Buxton added the harmony of the organ. Mrs. Johnson is a most excellent reader, and I am glad to announce that she is preparing Freethought readings and lectures for the Liberal platform. I am sure she will deserve eminent success.

Among other friends of this Bostonian week are Dr. Noyes, Messrs. Rockwood, Collier, Stillman, Palmer, Harrison, Ryan, Ralph Chainey, Geo. N. Hill, Dr. Symington Brown, and many others—a royal company. Miss Ora Simpson, of Columbus, O., is present at Boston Normal school, and Miss Louise Minchen from Iowa at the Emerson school of oratory. Both are of Liberal ancestry and pursue art and culture in the spirit of Freethought. Thus from East and West the sons and daughters throng to Boston and infuse its oriental elegance with the vigor and courage of the occident, the breath of the prairie, the whiff of the cyclone, and the breezy glory of the mountains. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening in German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street, New York, at 8 o'clock. Program for April:

April 19th—"The Bible and Modern Thought." S. P. Putnam.
April 26th—"Some Recent Advances in Science." Dr. R. G. Eccles.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Long Island Business College, South 8th street, between Bedford and Driggs avenues. Program for April:

April 21st—"The Uses of Philosophy." S. P. Putnam.
April 28th—Debate, "Protection vs. Free Trade." Mr. Henry Nichols and Mr. Henry Rowley.

THE German Freethinkers' Association meets every Sunday at 3 o'clock P. M., at Beethoven Hall, 212 E. Fifth street, New York. Program for April, 1895:

April 21st—"What is Truth?" Mr. Roessler.
April 28th—"The Resurrection of Jesus." Mr. Roessler.
Admission free. M. Wise, Sec., 154 E. 100th street.

THE Ohio Liberal Society meets every Sunday evening in G. A. R. Hall, 115 W. Sixth st., Cincinnati. Program for April will be as follows:

April 21st—Joint debate upon, "Resolved, That a Single Gold Standard is Better than a Bimetallic Standard." Atty. Chas. B. Wilby, affirmativ, and Mr. H. P. Boyden, negativ.
April 28th—"A Christian Truth vs. An Orthodox Myth." Atty. Stanley E. Bowdle.

THE Women's Liberal League of Philadelphia meets at 8 o'clock Tuesday evenings in the Skerrett Building, N. E. corner of Ridge avenue and Green street. Admission free. All welcome. Lectures for April:

April 23d—"Ancient Judaism." Samuel H. Gordon.
April 20th—"Mary Wollstonecraft." Thaddeus B. Wake-man.

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN will lecture in San Marcial, New Mexico, May 7th, 8th, and 9th. Freethinkers in that part of the country will do well to make an effort to hear her and assist the Liberals who are sustaining the work.

As a result of a debate between O. A. Phelps and a minister at Nipomo, Cal., the Freethinkers have organized a society, twenty-five joining the first week and paying an initiation fee of a dollar each. More have signified their intention of joining. This out of a population of less than a hundred is very gratifying. The dues have been fixed at twenty-five cents per month. Bertha Wilson Foreman is the secretary.

Letters of Friends.

One of Our Standbys.

WHITELAND, IND., April 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5 to extend my subscription another two years. I have read the paper regularly every week from the beginning of the Humphrey-Bennett debate till now, and don't feel like giving it up as long as I am able to pay for it. Wishing you success in opening the eyes of the blind, I remain,

Very truly yours, SAM'L. E. BEWEE.

Cheers for Tessa Kelso.

OMAHA, NEB., April 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1, to be divided equally between the Wise and Fleckten funds. Am sorry I cannot make it $100 instead.

By the way, I see by the dispatches that our brave librarian of the Los Angeles city library has "downed" the cowardly and contemptible hypocrit who slandered her lately from his pulpit. Three cheers for Miss Kelso! and all honor for Judge Clark!

JOHN MCARDLE.

Found He Must Hav It.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., April 3, 1895

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1 for four months' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I thought I could do without it when I left New York, but I must say I have been very lonesome for the last six months without it. I tried several news-dealers over here; some of them don't seem to have heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER; but you must remember this is the Quaker city, the home of church hypocrisy [one of them].

CHARLES WOOLLAM.

Who Was God's Typewriter?

KAMAS, UTAH, March 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: How can anyone believe what is recorded in the first chapter of Genesis before God (or the gods) had made man? Did he (God) have a clerk, or had he a typewriter, or did he afterwards tell anyone else about his sayings and doings? If so, who was he, what was his name? Any information will be acceptable. I once asked a Mormon bishop the above, and he said that Christ was with God. Which answer was not unexpected.

JACOB LUNDBERG.

He Feels Lonesome.

POMEROY, WASH., March 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6.50, for which please extend my subscription for one year, and send me "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." We manage to support seven or eight gospel expounders in a little town of about 800 or 900 inhabitants. I am about the only outspoken Freethinker in the town, and I have worn out Heston's picture book doing missionary work among the brethren. We have a number of Liberal men here, but they are afraid to speak their sentiments. I am going to have the first Freethought lecturer here that I can engage.

J. H. HENLEY.

This Is Good Work.

PRESCOTT, ARIZ., March 27, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Last week I sent you a small order for books and four trial subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. This week I inclose money and names for four more trial subscribers. "Let the good work go on." I trust I may be able to send you four subscribers each week, but this hope can hardly be realized.

The Freethought work is moving forward in this country, and much interest is being manifested in Liberal ranks. Arizona is surely a hot-bed of Infidelity when aroused.

DR. J. MILLER.

P. S.—I can add two more names for the paper in this order, and there will be more to follow as soon as money is plentier.

Yours respectfully, J. M.

Two Forms of Pleasure.

HAWTHORNE, IA., March 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money order. It is a pleasure to read my receipt for THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years, but it is a greater pleasure to read its pages from week to week. My father was always a Freethinker, but we never saw any Liberal papers until I was about twenty years old, when we became acquainted with the Boston Investigator, and then THE TRUTH

SEEKER about the time Mr. Bennett was first imprisoned. I am much pleased to see that friend Putnam's book is meeting with success. I must say that my letter to this paper last summer was the first letter I ever had published for me, and it was wholly unexpected. I often find that the letters from friends form a great part of the interesting portion of the paper. Liberals are not very plentiful here, and what few there are have not the independence of their beliefs and convictions. Professor Jamieson has been with us once.

Yours as ever, WALTER RUNNELS.

The Preacher's Pity Reciprocated.

LEXINGTON, O. T., March 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see I have rode out my ticket, so I will send you seventy-five cents to take me to the next station.

There was a revival meeting going on here some time since, and one of the several preachers participating thought himself good in an argument. He stopped in a grocery store, and the grocery-man saw me coming along the street and called me in and introduced me as Mr. Davidson, "the noted Infidel of Lexington." Parson Johnson began the argument, of which I will give a synopsis. We agreed as a basis for argument that if the foundation of a system is false the system is false. We also agreed that a god was the foundation of the Christian system, and that to be god this being must be all-wise, all-powerful, and all-good. He affirmed that the Christian God possessed these attributes; I denied, and this is the problem as I stated it: If there be a god who is all-wise and who therefore foresees evil, and having power to prevent it does not, the all-good is not discoverable. The only answer he gave me was that he was sorry for me, and I told him that I was equally sorry for him; that I never censured a person for his ignorance; that I always had pity for such. I told him I did not believe in prayer, but if I did, this would be my prayer: Deliver me from an orthodox god. A. K. DAVIDSON.

Amazed at Michigan News.

FAIRHAVEN, WASH., March 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It was with horror that I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 16th your account of the Michigan Sunday Law bill. If this bill becomes law, what difference will there be between the state of Michigan and tyrannical Russia?

The rich can amuse themselves six days in the week and have a comfortable home to pass Sunday in, but the workingman, who has to work six days in the week, will find it very little elevating to have to pass the Sunday inside of the four walls of his humble home (if he happen to have any). He will thereby in due time consider himself as an ox that is created to eat, sleep, and work only.

But what is that patriotic organization that sails under the flag of the American Protective Association doing to prevent such an insult to American institutions as these Sunday laws certainly are? Now would be a good time for the A. P. A. to convince the world that they do not compose a religious society organized for the purpose of downing another religious organization, and I am sure that if the A. P. A. really shows signs of being a true "American Protective Association" the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will let us know. But we must first know how they stand on the Sunday law question; also if they do or do not favor Bible reading in the public schools. Let us hear from you, gentlemen of the A. P. A. press. This doubt is liable to create suspicion, which will never do in this grave crisis.

Yours for truth and truth only,

J. S. ODEGAARD.

Where Our Missionary Work Took Effect.

BLUEFIELD, W. Va., April 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write to thank you for your club rates for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed find $4.90 for new subscribers on trial, and forty cents for one "Candle From Under the Bushel." I have been taught Christianity all my life—for twenty-five years—until about three months ago I saw the "Age of Reason," which, I must confess, is the noblest, grandest work of truth and reason I have ever been able to examine. It is undoubtedly what you claim for it, "without a peer in the world." My life would be a blank without it, and I have no doubt that the priest would have got me at death. Since reading the "Age of Reason" I have become a truth seeker and a Freethinker. Christianity has always kept me in constant fear and dread of some awful future world of eternal torment, the thoughts of which make men most miserable. When a man gives up his superstitious ideas and begins to look around at the laws of nature and science, he can not help seeing the fallacy of the writings of the Old and New Testaments. I think those fables, as they are taught, are the greatest impositions ever imposed upon the world. If practiced as taught they would destroy our freedom; that is, if the laws of the states would allow, or give to theocrats the power they are striving to get by mixing church and state affairs. It would bring about what it did from 1600 to 1630—thousands of human beings burnt at the stake for rejecting Roman Catholicism.

The Father of the Faithful and of our civil liberties, one of the noblest men that ever lived, Thomas Paine, revered the only God mentioned in the Declaration of Independence, of which he can truly be called the author and finisher.

I presume you will be surprised to learn of a new follower down in the little state of West Virginia, and for that reason I thought I would let you hear from me. I assure you that I am doing and will do all I can here for the good cause.

Yours very truly, E. M. MONTGOMERY.

Preachers' Wonderful Stories.

PORTLAND, ME., March 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have always made it a rule to impart to others that which would be of service to them, hence the following valuable information, told me by a friend who heard it at one of the revival meetings now being held at City Hall by Rev. B. Fay Mills, who, to illustrate the great worldly advantage it is to one to get religion, told of a man out West (like the wonderful cures made by patent medicines, it is always in some far-away locality) who made violins that sold for three or four dollars each. During a revival he got converted, and so great a change did it make in him that the next fiddle he made possessed so fine a tone it sold for $300. Later, he commenced to backslide, with the result that his work deteriorated. A renewal of faith was followed by a fiddle that brought him $400. Brother Freethinkers, get religion—it pays! And don't forget to backslide, so as to make possible renewal at greatly increased profits.

Another story was to the effect that a club of forty Infidels were all converted. I doubt if medical works record an instance of forty members of one society all suffering from softening of the brain at one time.

An attempt to induce all places of business to close one day in aid of the revival proved a flat failure. One man told the committee that the forty-five men in his employ needed the day's pay more than they did religion, and it was doubtful if a single man would attend the meetings should he close. The next request was for him to pay the men and give them the day. Christ must have had in mind the "cheek" of the latter-day Christian when he advised men to "turn the other one also." A blow on such a cheek would result only in injury to the hand that gave it. Some weeks after Ingersoll lectured here, the Rev. Mr. Hastings, of Boston, author of many anti-Infidel works, was brought here as an antidote, but still fearful that the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah would be visited in Portland, a three-weeks' revival was started. As yet the insurance rates have not been lowered.

"Orthodoxy."

WAUSEON, O., March 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: That belated "orthodox" minister, the Rev. Joseph Cook, in discussing the World's Religious Parliament Extension, says, "Christianity of the scholarly, biblical, and aggressive type stood forth in the World's Parliament of Religions among non-Christian faiths and philosophies as the sun among candles." This is an untruthful statement. The addresses of Rev. Dr. Momerie, of the Church of England; of Prof. Henry Drummond, of Glasgow, Scotland; of Rev. Theodore Munger, of New Haven, Conn., all "orthodox," disprove Mr. Cook's dictum. They are, substantially, in accord with the Theistic school—the Unitarians and reform Jews. That able and scholarly minister and editor of Unity of Chicago, Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, in his introductory to his book, "A Chorus of Faith as Heard in the Parliament of Religions," said: "To borrow a World's Fair phrase, the so-called Pagans 'made the best exhibit.'" All competent authority will assent to Reverend Jones's conclusion. Reverend Cook is of that rapidly decreasing clan who know of but one religion and whom that eminent scholar, Max Müller, referred to when he says: "Those who know but one religion [or language?] know none." The Christianity of Reverend Cook is not, however, the religion of Christ, who taught Judaism, and told the lawyer that to inherit eternal life he should keep the commandments. But let us compare Reverend Cook's kind of Christianity with a religion nearly seven hundred years older, and whose adherents far outnumber any other religionists—Buddhism. The Buddhists have not been obliged to invent a "two-kinds-of-wine" theory in order to bring their faith in accord with the temperance sentiment of the age, as has been done by the alleged followers of the Nazarene. Neither have they to apologize for slaughtering their fellows to spread their religion. Mackenzie, in his "Royal Masonic Encyclopedia," estimates that in "holy" wars, "religious" massacres, and "holy" Inquisition, 26,100,000 human lives have been sacrificed in propagating that kind of faith of which Rev. Cook is the exponent. "By their fruits shall ye know them," is as good a test to-day as when uttered more than eighteen hundred years ago. By that rule, Mr. Cook, your "sun among candles" is exceedingly dim. And do not forget that other declaration of the disciple of the Galilean—"He that doeth truth cometh to the light," etc.

Believes in Aggressive Work.

EUREKA, CAL., March 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $15, for which send me books as per list.

Is Mr. Putnam coming to California this year? I should like to see him. Before I went East I could get into a controversy with a preacher occasionally, but they will not argue with me now. I have purposely provoked them in print, but all treat me with silent contempt. Experience has taught them that they derive more glory by that course than by argument.

I received THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 16th, and am astonished at what you report about Mr. Omelvina. If a preacher in this county should make such a remark and it came to my knowledge, I would sit down upon him. Are there no Freethinkers in Petersburg, Ind., who can do the same thing? It is true, the press of the United States is a mercenary concern; the editors are cowards and hypocrites, and dare not own their souls, but as a rule they are business men, who keep in stock what the public desire; and if a Freethinker has something to say that people like to read, if only from curiosity, they will print it. The first preacher I attacked in print was a politician who clamored for Sunday law. The article filled the editor's sanctum with Methodists, and some stopped their papers, but where one subscriber was lost two were gained, and the editor was satisfied with the result.

If we want to make a mark in the world we must fight, using reason for our weapon. People are led by creeds having the sanction of ages, which must be dislodged before reason can take their place. The progress will be slow but sure, although the creeds will sometimes outflank us. The religious wedge has lately been entered in California. In our early days we used to have a legislature unlike other states, but since politics has become thoroughly rotten in California we have adopted another practice. We have a set of animals living here who have reverted to the state of their ancestors who roamed over the forests of Africa. As they are no earthly use for anything else they have become politicians, and at every election we pick out the meanest of them and send them to Sacramento to quarrel among themselves and do us all the mischief they can. Here and there a man gets among them, who is disgraced by being classed as one of them, and who has no power to avert their mischief. So it is not strange that one animal from Marin county, by name of McAllister, disgraced his constituents by entering the religious wedge in favor of Sunday legislation.

Send me "When Were Our Gospels Written?" with other books, and I will send you $15. Place the remainder where it will do the most good. R. GUNTHER.

Concerning Various Topics.

PLEASANT LAKE, IND., March 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed herewith my order for books, also some additional cash for use in the Fleckten school fight, and for the assistance of Mr. Wise, as directed. I have Bell's "Hand-Book," "Old Testament Stories Illustrated," and the "Pictorial Text-Book," and if these will not make Freethinkers of those who read them thoughtfully, I cannot imagine what would. But few church people, however, can be induced to read such works, for fear, I suppose, that their all-merciful and loving God will damn them for it, if they were tempted to use the reasoning powers he has given them. I have two sisters who are church members, and they are like the majority, for although we have many Liberal books, as well as THE TRUTH SEEKER, to read, they will not look at them, nor pay attention to the reading of anything they contain, but they obtained their relish for superstition elsewhere, for all the others of the family are Freethinkers. My grandfather in his younger days was a faithful member of the Presbyterian church, but became a radical Freethinker as the result of careful Bible reading and investigation; and nearly all of his descendants are Freethinkers. There are many Liberals in this vicinity, but most all are of the do-nothing kind. Some time since I tried to secure some subscribers for your paper, but without success, as the times are so close here that those who would subscribe could not spare the means to do so. Am glad to see such a story as "Marion Hepburn's Heresy" in the paper, and hope you may secure more of a similar style, for the Christians are prone to introduce into some of our periodicals stories of an opposite character, another sly scheme of theirs to instill their superstitions into the minds of thoughtless readers. Some time ago some of the Liberals here secured J. E. Remsburg to deliver a lecture, and obtained the trustee's consent to use the town school hall for that purpose, but when the Christians found it out they used their influence and induced him to withdraw his consent to use the school building, so the lecture was postponed until a vacant store building, owned by a Liberal of our town, was secured for the occasion. Mr. Remsburg's lecture, "False Claims of the Church," was fairly well attended, nearly all being Liberals. Two ministers, however, were there, and one of them (a Baptist) became much out of humor, and as soon as the lecture closed he made the announcement that he would answer Mr. Remsburg's statements in his sermon the next Sunday, and at once left the room. Mr. Remsburg had invited criticism, but his saintly highness evidently did not care to enter into any argument then and there. I did not attend his meeting, but have little doubt that his answer consisted mostly of the usual abuse used by the clergy to belittle those who dare think for themselves. But this agent of the celestial kingdom did not stay in our town long; he evidently believed in Christ's admonition only when modified so as to read, "Giv to the clergy, and let the poor take care of themselves, and give something if they will," for he had not been here long before people began to observe that he took no notice, when meeting them, of those who dropped no cash into the contribution box, but saved his cordiality for the cheerful giver. Truly a typical specimen of God's agents, but many people are too good for their religion, based on the doctrines of a barbarian Bible, so this worthy apostle of glory did not suit them. We have in our state one of those musty relics of superstition, a Sunday law, which, within my recollection, has been brought forth to fine a barber for shaving a man on Sunday, and also a man for hunting on that sacred day. But the latter really deserved little sympathy, for he afterward was fool enough to join the church, and thus become a supporter of the usurper of his liberty, and so long as we have such people among us it seems evident that the fool killer, if not a myth, is at least disgracefully negligent of his duty. I am sorry to learn that we lost in the church-tax contest in Oregon, and hope that the Liberals having means will come forth with enough to produce better results in the future, and long may THE TRUTH SEEKER flourish to battle for the right. I would be pleased to correspond with Freethinkers living in California, along the coast between Santa Cruz and Los Angeles; so, ladies and gentlemen, will you let me hear from you? Respectfully yours, CHANCY AVERY.

A Preacher Commended and Criticised.

PORT ANGELES, WASH., March 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The last issue of the Port Angeles Stimoon published a sermon recently delivered by Rev. F. F. Passmore, of Denver, Col. The reverend is a reformer and will, probably, soon be reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. I send you a few extracts from his sermon, but he also made some other remarks, to which I have written a reply, which you may publish if you will. Yours truly, FRANK MORSE.

REV. F. F. PASSMORE, DENVER, COL., Dear Sir: I have just been reading a sermon of yours in which you have told more truth than an ordinary minister would tell in ten years. I hope you will continue in your good work, and I wish there were thousands more like you, but I hope you will not be offended when I tell you that I think you have made some mistakes. When you tell us that God's word is a sufficient guide, you cause only confusion, for the question naturally arises, What is God's word? We open the Bible and read: "Thou shalt not kill" (Deut. v, 17). Then we turn but a few more leaves and read: "But thou shalt surely kill him. Thine hand shall be the first upon him to put him to death" (Deut. xiii, 9). "David behaved himself wisely in all his ways, and the Lord was with him; and David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem" (2 Sam. v, 10-13). "David danced before the Lord with all his might, and he dealt as well to the women as men, to every one a flagon of wine" (vi, 14, 19). "Noah was a just man and perfect . . . and he drank the wine and was drunken" (Gen. vi, 9; ix, 21). "Thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for . . . wine or for strong drink" (Deut. xiv, 26). "Drink thy wine with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy work" (Eccl. ix, 7). "I will give to thy servants twenty thousand baths of wine" (2 Chron. ii, 10). "I will give you the rain in his due season . . . that thou mayest gather in thy corn and thy wine" (Deut. xi, 14). "Give wine unto those that be of heavy heart; let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more" (Prov. xxxi, 6, 7). That is what the saloon keepers are doing; they and the preachers that you have criticised are following the teachings of the Bible. The only trouble is, they have gotten hold of the wrong guide book. The first book on total abstinence that was ever written was written by an infidel Judge Hertell. I am as much against intoxicating liquor as you are, but we can never destroy it with the Bible. I approve of most of your sermon, but regret that you take the position you do in regard to the Sabbath. You seem to be very much agitated because the trains, factories, and street cars are running on the Sabbath. The priests also became agitated in Christ's time and accused him of being a Sabbath-breaker. He defended himself and his disciples in working on the Sabbath, and taught that it was right to do good instead of evil on all days alike. St. Paul said: "Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a holy day . . . or of the Sabbath days; let every man be persuaded in his own mind." The Constitution of the United States guarantees entire religious liberty to every citizen, and whenever any Sabbath laws are made they are in violation of the Constitution. The question which day is the Sabbath is still an unsettled one. The Bible says it is the last day of the week, and it was so considered until the year 321, when the emperor Constantine, a Roman sun-worshiper, joined the Christian church and commanded people to rest on the venerable day of the sun. His edict can be found in Encyclopedia Britannica, article Sunday. Constantine and his soldiers killed many of the Christians, and after a few generations had passed away the Christians finally accepted Sunday, the first day of the week, as the Sabbath, the same as they do now, without even asking the reason why. There are some of them, however, known as Adventists, who still rest on the Sabbath instead of Sunday.

Yours respectfully, FRANK MORSE.

From Reverend Passmore's Sermon.

An unfaithful ministry prolonged to centuries the dark night of the Middle Ages. I have looked into human history, human effort, human nature; I have watched the human race in its efforts to rise, wondering why the world had made so little advancement, why civilized nations were so uncivilized. . . . I am astonished to find that the men, or class of men, whom God intended should be the foremost men in all reformations, have been the men who have, as a class, discouraged reformations and helped to persecute and burn the reformers. It was the ministry of the days of Wycliffe, Huss, Jerome, and Savonarola that not only discouraged those men in their search for light and truth, but kindled the fires of hate and death. . . . We come down to our nation, and in the great anti-slavery contest waged for the liberation of African slaves the ministers were on the side of the masters, against the slaves. . . . Our government heeds every beck and call of the rich, but the cry of the helpless and needy poor goes unheard, unanswered. In all the wrongs, wickedness, distress, oppression, and corruptions to which we have referred, where has stood the ministry and where do they stand to-day? They stand convicted of neglect of duty.

The next reformation that must be agitated and materialized is to reform the ministry. There has never yet been a reformer burned or persecuted that the ministry did not have a hand in the work. There never has been an era of slavery and oppression that the ministry, as a class, were not with the oppressor. It was the preachers who crucified Christ, opposed Luther, and upheld the nobility against the peasantry before the French Revolution, and proclaimed slavery in America.

Jehovah-Elohim.

NEW YORK, April 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I find in the "Observations" of one of your contributors that my argument is not convincing to all that "Elohim," in Genesis, means one God. Yet I think it is very plain to a Hebrew student. I have not alluded to the gender of God. In translating the first few verses in Genesis, endeavoring to prove that "Elohim" meant one god, I thought it necessary to translate them verbatim. The second verse reads:

V. Ruah Elohim Merahepeth
And the spirit God she moves.
It was not God who moved; it was the spirit of God. "Ruah" is the Hebrew for spirit, and feminine in its gender. My aim was to show that in the original Hebrew it is singular—she, not, they. This also is plain to a Hebraist, and it is plain to everybody that there was no woman in the case.

Of course, here is a good chance to corner me, for it shows a duality of God, since the spirit was a separate object. To this I will answer as to many other questions: Since all Freethinkers agree that the God of the Bible was made by man, and considerably like man (only a little worse), then it is very natural that man should grant him a spirit, though still believing in his oneness. This answer I will now use to the more important question: "If God was the only one on the job, to whom did he issue orders and make suggestions?" etc., etc. If he was made by man and like man, why should he not speak to himself? We very often hear people say, "I said to myself" so and so. Nor will my argument suffer any by saying that he may have spoken to his angels, charioteers, holy beasts, seraphim, and cherubim, for nobody denies that the Bible claims such beings, but they are not admitted as gods, or his compeers.

It has been pointed out by many eminent Hebrew scholars that Elohim and Jehovah mean one and the same God under two names. Jehovah is a composite word from three others, Hoyoh (he was), Hoveh (he is), Tihyeh (he will be). It signifies no more exalted position than Elohim. Bnai-Elohim has been explained as the sons of the mighty, and this is what I alluded to in my previous article, saying that Elohim means also power, strength.

Regarding the changes which might have taken place in the Hebrew language since the Bible was first written, I have many reasons to believe that it changed but very little if at all. These reasons are too numerous and too lengthy to be given here. But even supposing that it has undergone some changes, what of that? I argue these questions from the Bible as I find it to-day, and as everybody reads, understands, and discusses it. Another thing must be taken into consideration: If we insist that there were changes, then errors must in consequence have crept in; then that book is entitled to more favor at our hands, and it should not be censured too harshly.

There were and still are a good many students who have acquired a perfect knowledge of the Hebrew by studying the Hebrew Bible, for it is the only source of this language. It contains the whole vocabulary of the Hebrew. Such men we find in this country as well as in Europe—the Jewish rabbis, authors, poets, and fiction writers, and yet have never exacted any medals. That beautiful and poetical language has a perfect grammar called "Talmud-Lshon-Evry," and to discriminate between a verb and a noun is the easy work of any student after a few lessons.

I am not a defender of the Bible. Long ago I had a falling out with that book, and we have not made up yet. Still I believe in giving the Bible writers their due. They have positively advocated one God all through the Bible, and it is strange to me that the very places where they teach the serving one God and not the many—meaning the idols—should be misconstrued. I will quote here two verses of the Bible, "Hear, O Israel, Jehovah Elohim is one God" (Deut. vi, 4). "For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them as the Lord our God is in all things that we call on him" (Deut. iv, 7). Now, if that verse had been translated correctly it would read like the Hebrew, thus, "For what nation is there so great, who hath gods that are so nigh unto him as the Lord our God is in all things that we call on him?" What Hebrew scholar can be so blind as not to see that the first Elohim in that verse means idols, and the last Elohim means the God of the Bible?

Of course some Christian minister might have a fit over my accusation that they have translated the Bible falsely, and there may be some Freethinkers who will ask, "Who is that man who assumes such authority?" Nevertheless, it is so. Ask any Hebrew scholar to translate that verse without seeing the English Bible, and he will, he must, translate it as I do.

Now, a few words about that so-much-talked-of God. Can I worship him? No! They have made a God who is less good, less moral, and less intelligent than the average man. Can I love him? No! They have a God who likes blood, who in cited a pack of brickmakers to plunder and rob nations on whom they had not the least claim, to kill the men, slaughter their innocent babes, and take the surviving wives home; a God who favored the bad and condemned the good. He despised the innocent offering of Cain, fruits of the earth, and respected that of Abel because there was blood! A God who made a patriarch of that tricky, defrauding, cheating, rascally Jacob, and ignored the manly, generous, and forgiving Esau! A God who punished the gentle and noble King Saul, and chose that adulterer, murderer, hypocritical fiddler, David, the son of Boaz and Ruth, of cornfield fame, descendant of Judah and Tamar, who struck a bargain on the road to Timnath. He is the David who begot Solomon the licentious, both masters of the art, and the God of the Bible set them aside for the purpose of making himself a son! This is the Bible's God who is father of Jesus, ben Joseph Pandra, the carpenter, fool, and knave of Jerusalem, redeemer of the world. Selah. MOREH NEBUCHIM.

P. S.—"Moreh Nebuchim" is not a biblical name. Is is the name of a book written by a great Jewish philosopher, Maimon, who lived in the twelfth century, and was very liberal in his teachings.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Shuffle-Shoon and Amber Locks.

Shuffle-Shoon and Amber Locks
Sit together building blocks;
Shuffle-Shoon is old and gray,
Amber Locks a little child.
But together at their play
Age and youth are reconciled;
And with sympathetic glee
Build their castles fair to see.
"When I grow to be a man"
(So the wee one's prattle ran)
"I shall build a castle so—
With a gateway broad and grand;
Here a pretty vine shall grow,
There a soldier guard shall stand;
And the tower shall be so high Folks will wonder by and by!"
Shuffle-Shoon quoth: "Yes, I know;
Thus I buildied long ago!"
Here a gate and there a wall,
Here a window, there a door;
Here a steeple wondrous tall
Riseth ever more and more!
And the years have leveled low
What I buildied long ago!"
So they gossip at their play,
Heedless of the fleeting day;
One speaks of the long ago,
Where his dead hopes buried lie;
One with chubby cheeks aglow
Prattleteth of the by and by;
Side by side they build their blocks—
Shuffle-Shoon and Amber Locks.

Education and Its Value.

"He who knows not and knows not that he knows not is a fool; avoid him."
"He who knows not and knows that he knows not is a child; lead him."
"He who knows and knows not that he knows, is asleep; wake him."
"He who knows and knows that he knows is a wise man; follow him."

The above is an Arabian proverb that I have heard or read. I am not sure I have quoted it correctly, but at any rate it is right in substance and will serve me as a text.

When one knows not and knows not that he knows not, he has about reached the acme of disagreeableness, for he is sure to be conceited in proportion to his ignorance, and to render himself a nuisance to all about him, while serene in the belief that his noisy mouthings are a source of delight to his hearers.

When one knows not and knows that he knows not, it is best to help or lead him; for instance, if you enter the school-room with your lesson unprepared, do not pretend you know when you do not know, for a pretense of knowledge will simply repel others and leave you probably as ignorant as before; while a confession of your ignorance will make others willing to help you.

If one has a genius for certain things—for example, drawing—and has had no opportunity to develop this talent so that he fully comprehends it, you might say he knows but knows not that he knows, and his talent must be awakened.

But when a man knows and knows that he knows, he is a wise man and we ought to follow him.

When Philip of Macedon conquered Greece he was able to do it because he had an education in warfare. He had carefully studied the armies and the way the different people had fought before his time, and he improved the way and had different plans upon which he worked, and he won the battle.

Some may think that by an education we may mean going through all the higher branches and perhaps a college. True this is an education in one sense of the word, but still one may have a college education, and yet not be able to become a teacher or anything like that, because he has simply gone over his lessons in a hurry, and not given them enough thought, or, in other words, he knew his lesson for the time being, but a week or so after knew nothing about it at all.

Solon, the man who made the wise laws of Greece, was an educated man. He knew he knew, and the people followed him. He had carefully studied the laws made by other rulers, but it seems that they all failed, and he tried to improve on them and make them better. He was educated in such a way that he knew what was best for the people.

Some are happy only when they are out of doors, running, jumping, wrestling, or dancing; and some, I think, are happy only when they are eating; or, in other words, when they are enjoying some physical pleasure, while others care more for learning. Man must have enjoyment; if not mental, then it must be physical, which is not always elevating.

Education trains powers through knowledge. Without education we could never accomplish anything of account. A book that may be clear to a man who has studied science is incomprehensible to him who knows nothing of science. The savage looks upon education with superstition and wonder, but is indifferent to its charms and is content to leave its higher pleasures to others, while he is satisfied with the physical enjoyment of his purely animal life.

The book of science is opened to him through education, and after centuries of evolution he may catch the inspirations of the geni of literature and rise to a level with the great minds of earth; he then becomes a creature of ideas and aspirations instead of remaining a mere animal; that is, he is civilized instead of savage.

Knowledge as such, and its uses for manhood and the ultimate results of happiness, are often underestimated. Imagine a man born in a beautiful valley, shut in by the walls of a tower from the glories of nature; think of him as having matured in body with no thought or language other than such as pertains to the needs of his physical existence. Then open up to him the beauties of nature; would he not look upon it as a temple of infinit proportions adorned by the master hand of a genius?

Such is the contrast, only less in degree, between the ignorant boor and the scholar. The thoughtless person who argues against education little knows how much he and all are indebted to it. The demand for general intelligence is increasing. Earnest men are endeavoring to make a certain degree of culture universal. We may say that ideas move the world. Material progress does not make the spirit of the age, but the spirit of the age makes material progress.

It is related in history that in the Messinian war the Spartans, obeying the Delphic Oracle, sent to Athens for a leader, and the Athenians, in scorn and contempt, sent a lame schoolmaster; but, contrary to the Athenians' expectations, the schoolmaster's songs and ideas so moved the Spartans that they finally gained the victory.

Abraham Lincoln rose to be president of the United States. His ideas moved or inspired the nation and he led the people to look up to him. Thomas Jefferson inspired his countrymen by impressing upon them the fact that in order to make a people strong they must no longer be dominated over by English lords.

Natural features of forest, sea, mountain or desert have a great deal to do with one's character and thoughts. In ancient times when men lived in caves and one had a wise thought, he carried it to his neighbor and the neighbor would very likely tell it to another, and that was the way education spread. A little later the thinker of the wise thought would write it down on a tablet, and this tablet would be handed down through generations, and now we have the printing-press by which we can publish thousands of thoughts at once, and these thoughts circulate among thousands of people.

of schools, but if we read good papers and books, and if we study nature, we may get a very good and noble education.

Some laugh at poetry and think it all nonsense, while the thinkers pity the laughers and admire the poetry and its author, whose ideas inspire them.

A greater portion of the daily papers that we read every day is given over to accounts of murders, robberies, and other crimes committed, while a small and trivial space is given to a lecture or anything like that which has been delivered for educational purposes. Is there not room for the scholar and his ideals?

This century is not wanting in literary power, although a great many writers have expressed their opinion that it is. Take, for instance, Carlyle, who proclaims this an age of romance.

There is a glory of the present and a glory of the past. The glory of the past was in its literature, its art, and its examples of greatness. Let us retain the ancient glory and add to it the marvelous scientific and practical spirit of the present. Then we shall have a civilization surpassing all.

LAURA MANSON.

Correspondence.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Feb. 24, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send you an essay which I wrote for a contest held Dec. 21, 1894, which I would like to have you publish if you think it is worthy. The contest was between the two sides of our society, of which all of the pupils of the high school are members. I did not win, but next time I will try to do better.

Yours truly, LAURA MANSON,

ROCKVILLE, IDAHO, March 16, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I am fourteen years of age, and would like to have some of the children of the Corner write to me.

We live on a farm seven miles from Rockville. Rockville is a country post-office. We started to dig out some rattlesnakes the 8th and 9th of this month, and killed one hundred and one, but did not strike the main den; but we put in a blast where we thought it was, which would have killed them. We are not bothered by the Christians any more since they have found that they cannot "save" any of us.

We have six calves and two colts. I will close, hoping to see this in print. I still remain a Freethinker. Yours respectfully, CHAS. C. CARLTON.

[My! what a country for rattlesnakes! Can't you tell us something about the appearance, manners, rattles, method of warfare and defense of the rattlesnake? In a private note Charley says he is intending to send the Editor of the Corner some pretty specimens from Eastern Oregon for our cabinet. We shall be pleased to receive them.—ED. C. C.]

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREE-THOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Gems of Thought.

DIPLOMACY as the politicians understand it is little more than high-priced trickery. —Galveston News.

THE small stones which fill up the crevices have almost as much to do with making the fair and firm wall as the great rocks; so the right and wise use of spare moments contributes not a little to the building up, in good proportion with strength, a man's mind. —The Myrtle.

THE Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles, and the Apocalypse assert the existence of the devil, of his demons, and of hell, as plainly as they do that of God and his angels and heaven. It is plain that the Messianic and the Satanic conceptions of the writers of these books are the obverse and the reverse of the same intellectual coinage. —Professor Huxley.

A GOOD man will feel more sensitively anxious that strict justice should be done by the particular community of which chance has made him a component member than by any others; but then, people who feel acutely this joint responsibility of all the citizens to uphold the moral right are not praised as patriots but reviled as unpatriotic. —Grant Allen.

No philosopher's stone of a constitution can produce golden conduct from leaden instincts. No apparatus of senators, judges, and police, can compensate for the want of an internal governing sentiment. No legislative manipulation can eke out an insufficient morality into a sufficient one. No administrative sleight of hand can save us from ourselves. —Herbert Spencer.

THE constitution of the individual wisely resents the interferences of alien hands. The individual must be left to himself. Unencroached upon, free to live out his career according to the instincts which possess him, he will offer the social body its richest contributions of health and joy. Legislation is mainly contradiction—it flies in the face of nature—it is the survival of the instinct of distrust—it would make of character a useless mendicant. —Horace L. Traubel.

THERE is always room for a new thought, a new word, or a new movement that marks the onward march of man. They represent "the long-felt want" which must be met, and the old thought, old words, and old movements might as well close up and give way and make room for them. To do anything else will be "kicking against the pricks." The most inevitable things in the world are not stationary, and all stationary things are not permanent. There is a difference between stolidity and solidity. —The New Unity.

SAFE incarceration, and a rational prison discipline, will protect society as fully as it is possible under present social conditions. The history of crime and penology, we think, fully justifies our contention. We oppose legal killing in the interest of society. It harms all, it benefits no one. If the mother would not kill her child because he developed and emphasized her weaknesses, neither should a race, or as we generally say, society, slay its offspring because it developed the weaknesses well known to be characteristic of a generation. Reformation in both cases is demanded by justice and all that is human. —Progressive Age.

THE king said to the people: "God made you peasants, and he made me king; he made you to labor, and me to enjoy; he made rags and hovels for you, robes and palaces for me. He made you to obey, and me to command. Such is the justice of God." And the priest said: "God made you ignorant and vile; he made me holy and wise; you are the sheep, I am the shepherd; your flocks belong to me. If you do not obey me here, God will punish you now and torment you forever in another world. Such is the mercy of God. You must not reason. Reason is a rebel. You must not contradict—contradiction is born of egotism; you must believe. He that hath ears to hear let him hear." Heaven was a question of ears. —Ingersoll.

WHAT can compare to life? What glorious wonder in the universe is equal to the act of sense and consciousness? What gift of destiny can hold a place by that supreme and splendid flower of Nature's evolution? Of the purely intellectual, immaterial existence, promised us by the churches, in invisible hereafters, experience has taught us nothing. But the life we have the happiness to know swells in its April bud, blooms like a flower in its May, and like a flower dies in its December; and when its leaves are once fallen, other flowers may bloom, but not that flower—our flower, the life-flower of each of us, not to the end of all the cycles, secula seculorum, never! There is no May but May! —Cyprian de Biddle Cope, in "At Century's Ebb."

PIANOS! PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STROCK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

MISSIONARY: "Wou't you take a tract, my friend?" Whoop La (the Pawnee): "Not much! Last tract said: 'And Lo, he was cast out.'"

"Hav you thanked Uncle Charles for your dog yet, Freddie?" "Yes; but I oughter had it anyway; I've been praying for a dog the last two months."

CLERK (to curate): "I'm terribly sorry, zur, that you be a-gwaine to lave us. We've changed ever so many times since Passen Green died, and always for the wuss!"

The Post-Dispatch publishes three columns of opinions of St. Louisans on Sam Jones. One man says: "He is a genuin hot tamale." In other words, Mr. Jones is not classed among those who are not worth shucks.—Galveston News.

A QUEER church ornament is a fiddle and bow weathercock which swings to the wind on Great Gomersby church, near Grantham, England. The church was the gift of a fiddler, who emigrated and grew rich and who insisted on this queer condition. Could a titled pastor of that church be called a "fiddle D. D."—New York Recorder.

A Congo nativ, who has been taught to read and write, has just sent a letter, his first, to the archbishop of Canterbury. It reads as follows: "Great and good chief of the tribe of Christ, greeting: The humbliest of your servants kisses the hem of your garments and begs you to send to his fellow servants more gospel and less rum. In the bonds of Christ. UGALIA."

At a recent Sunday-school service in Bath, Me., the minister was illustrating the necessity of Christian profession in order to fully enjoy the blessings of Providence, and to make himself clear to his youthful hearers, said: "For instance, I want to introduce water into my house. The pipes and faucets are all in good order, but I get no water, and why not?" He expected the children to see that it was because he had no connection with the main in the street, but they all looked perplexed. Finally a five-year-old boy squealed out: "I know; it's because you don't pay up."

ANENT the art of counting, brought to so high a degree of excellence by some of our modern revivalists, a friend of ours tells a good story. A God-fearing Presbyterian minister in a Southern town, attending a meeting which was in charge of a famous evangelist, was invited to pray for "the forty-five who had just risen, asking prayer, and for the twenty-seven who arose last night for the same purpose." The venerable preacher, with scrupulous care, prayed: "O Lord, bless the forty-five persons who stood up to-night for prayer; and bless, also, the twenty-seven who stood up last night, although it may be possible, O Lord, that some of those who stood up last night stood up also to-night."

BALLAD OF THE BOLTED BONES.
Miss Sarah Adeliza Jones,
A ritualistic maid devout,
Possessed a box of holy bones
She couldn't get along without.

Full many a finger that, for alms,
Cash down, had erst absolved and blessed,

Full many a toe whose saintly charms
Devotion's pious lips had pressed.

Ascetic was the maiden's bent,
And in her self-devotion vast,
Vicariously keeping Lent,
She set her poodle-dog to fast.

And bade him liv on cold, raw hope
The inner dog to mortify;
Ah! maid devout, 'twas rash to ope
The relic-chest when he was by!

In vain the blow—the warning tones—
For ere she bolted down the lid
The dog had bolted down the bones
And bolted down the street and hid.

FARMER OATCAKE, who, with his good wife, Mandy, is on a brief visit to a daughter-in-law in Buffalo, looked over the newspapers on Saturday in an endeavor to find a church service on the following day which he might attend with hope of securing spiritual satisfaction. He soon gleaned that the following Scriptural subjects would be discussed from various city pulpits: "Is the Trilby Craze Dying Out?" "Fitzsimmons vs. Corbett." "How the Pastor Spends His Vacation." "Should Our Daughters Marry Foreign Noblemen?" "High Sleeves and Theater Hats." "The Gold Brick Saloon." "Canal Street on Saturday Night." "Wordsworth and the Lake School of Poetry." "The LIIRD Congress." "Rights of Motormen." Farmer Oatcake gave it up after awhile and laid down the paper, saying, with a sigh: "Laws sakes, Mandy! I do believe that the gospel and the scheme of salvation hav gone clear out of fashion."—Buffalo Express.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

I am out of debt, and thanks to the Dish Washer business for it. In the past five weeks I have made over $600, and I am so thankful that I feel like telling everybody, so that they can be benefited by my experience. Anybody can sell Dish Washers because everybody wants one, especially when it can be got so cheap. I believe that in two years from now every family will have one. You can get full particulars by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., E. E. Pittsburg, Pa., and you can't help but make money in this business. I believe that I can clear over $3,000 the coming year, and I am not going to let such an opportunity pass without improvement. We can't expect to succeed without trying Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FREETHINKER (to PARKHURST ET AL): "Would it not be better to first destroy the mother reptil and her nest, before you try to stamp out the brood?"

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam will, about May 1st, start for a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

Religion in Pennsylvania Schools.

The decision of Judge Gunster in the Waverly borough injunction case (reported at length in these columns last week) had no immediate and appreciable effect upon Principal Hanyon and his constitution- and justice-defying backers. At a meeting of the school board on April 4, Director George E. Stevenson, who applied for the injunction against Principal Hanyon, read the decision of Judge Gunster to the board and then moved that Mr. Hanyon be instructed to discontinue religious exercises in the school, and that visitors who may hereafter address the school be not permitted to talk to the children on religious subjects and existing political parties. But a substitute motion was got in ahead of this, the chief features of which were approval of the principal's action and a formal instruction to him to open the school with the reading of the Bible and the other exercises of which complaint had been made. The motion prevailed by the vote of four to two, Mr. Stevenson and Rev. D. N. Vail voting in the negativ. Up to this time Principal Hanyon had disregarded the decision of Judge Gunster on his own responsibility, but thereafter he had a majority of the board officially backing him.

In a communication in the Scranton Truth of April 9, two of the ministers of Waverly protest that Principal Hanyon has been misrepresented, that he has not taught sectarianism in the school; and they add that the whole issue hinges on the question whether the Bible is a sectarian book. They are right in this last statement. The Bible is a sectarian book, and as such has no place in the public schools of any state. These ministers say that the board has long had a standing rule on its records that the children of Catholic parents need not report until 9:15 A.M. The intention, they say, was to excuse these children "during devotional exercises." But why, if these "devotional" exercises are not sectarian, should these children of the Catholic sect be excused from attending them? And why should Catholics be robbed of fifteen minutes of their educational time to please the Protestants?

In a later number of Truth Mr. Stevenson asks the reverend gentlemen several very hard questions of this nature, and remarks that, while he does not desire to interfere with anyone's religious opinions, and does not wish to enforce his views upon the children of others in the public schools, he denies that the majority, "simply because they are a majority," have the right to obtrude their beliefs upon his children in the schools for which he helps pay. That has the right ring, and we hope he will not falter in his attempt to secure justice for all citizens in Pennsylvania.

Showing Their Hands.

At a recent meeting in the Paulist Fathers church in New York, Father Elliott said that "when the advocates of the Continental Sunday, so-called, wished to cast a stigma on the American Sabbath, they spoke of the Sunday law." Then he added:

"Well, it is a Sunday law, and there is no law in the world touching morals and religion if it be not the Sunday law. The law given on Sinai is a law, and, please God, there will be a Sunday law as long as our government lasts. The continental Sunday is not the Sabbath of its Christian population. It is the Sunday of heathen Berlin, of rotten Vienna, and of godless Paris."

What becomes of the assertion of the more timid or less truthful Sabbatarians that Sunday legislation is not religious legislation? Father Elliott in effect says that there is no such thing as laws touching religion if the Sunday statute is not such a law. And he is right. His remarks are also symptomatic of the growing disposition of the Catholics to help out the Puritans in their Sunday law crusade. If it is once generally admitted that religious laws of that kind can be enacted, the pace is set for other religious legislation. Were not the Covenanters bigotry-blind, they would see that they are playing directly into the hands of Rome. Perhaps they do see it, and that is why they are pursuing the course which they have so long followed.

On the evening of April 7, union Sabbath meetings were held in seven of the Protestant churches of Milwaukee. Some startling assertions were made by the speakers, and the real grievance of the church was more than once incautiously admitted. At the meeting in the Fifth Baptist church, E. J. Felmann read a paper in which he made the assertion that the non-observance of Sunday ruined one hundred thousand lives annually in this country. Why did he not say a million? Such a statement would have been as true as the one he made. Rev. J. Churm thought—or, to be more accurate, he said that he thought—that Sabbath desecration was as detrimental to the city as small-pox. Perhaps he did think so, for undoubtedly an epidemic of small-pox would bring much grist to the mills of the churches, while "Sabbath desecration," as Mr. Churm frankly but indiscreetly said, sends the custom in other directions. That we in no degree misrepresent the reverend gentleman may be shown easily by quoting his own words. Among the other open Sunday places which he denounced were the candy and toy stores, where, he wailed, "a child often spends a penny or nickel when it ought to give it to the Sunday-school!" Do the children who thus mispend their money help make up that army of one hundred thousand which, as asserted by Mr. Felmann, is annually dropped into the pit of destruction through the trap-door of Sabbath desecration? To some, such talk as that of Mr. Churm may seem too trifling for serious notice, but we submit that it is worth recording because it indicates just what is troubling the ministers. They have a horror of free competition. In order that the wasted missionary fund may be replenished, they would even deny to children the opportunity to get the confections and toys dear to every childish heart.

At the Grand Avenue M. E. church, Rev. E. W. White, pastor of the Baptist Tabernacle and president of the Wisconsin Sabbath Association, was the principal speaker. He started in with the assertion that it was not their desire to secure a Puritan Sunday nor to revive the blue laws. This is distinctly not true, for the Sabbath for which Mr. White and his associates are working is the blue law Sabbath of the Puritans. He wants to stop all work and close all places of amusement—except the churches—on Sunday, and this can be done only by blue laws, and the result must be the Puritan Sabbath. He admitted this the next moment when he declared that he and his association wanted to preserve the "American Sabbath." We all know what that means. As to his further assertion that as laws forbidding the desecration of the Sabbath are on the statute books they should be enforced, for to hold to the contrary "involved a defiance of all law," it is sufficient to say that this "argument" is sheer pettifoggery. Who but such men and women as the members of his association got those laws put on the statute books? They are repugnant to the common sense and love of justice of the masses of the people of Milwaukee, and if the preachers do not want to see them persistently violated why do they not agitate for their repeal instead of clamoring for their enforcement and the enactment of others still more sweeping and stringent? It is the easiest thing in the world for the tyrant to establish bad laws and then, when he is reproached for the misery he causes in his efforts to enforce them, take refuge in the deceptiv plea that he is not trying to compel the people to think as he does, but to render due reverence to law, as law. It is safe to say that there has never been a despot, single-headed or hydra-headed, who was not familiar with the trick. In the present instance, as always, it is a contemptible evasion of the real issue. Mr. White also said that were it not for the churches the laboring men would be compelled to work seven days for six days' pay. On the contrary, so little has the church done for the cause of the worker, that if it should bend all its energies from this time on to secure the enactment of a law compelling all laboring men to work seven days for six days' pay it would ingloriously fail. The cleric does not appear to know that a very large proportion of the wage work done on Sunday is piece work for which the laborer receives at least as high wages as he does for the work done on any other day of the week, and often higher. He has also forgotten that the workers have secured the shorter day and the recognition of many other of their rights without the aid of the church, just as the black laborer of the South was made free in spite of the indifference or active opposition of the great majority of the churches and preachers.

As to the cry of "personal liberty" which would be raised against the Milwaukee crusade, Mr. White said that it would "come from men who never knew what liberty was until they touched the shores of America." Oh! He likewise threw in the faces of the friends of the rational Sunday the alleged financial failure which attended the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. Just in the ratio that the Fair was open on the first day of the week was that opening a financial success. Had it been as fully open every Sunday as it was the two last "Sabbaths," Sunday opening would have been a brilliant financial triumph. But the Directory was half afraid of the priests, and in that cowardice is to be found the explanation of the small attendance most of the time. People were not going to pay full price for a fifth part of a show. In conclusion this decadent follower of Roger Williams said that he expected to meet great opposition in the work to which he had addressed himself, for he had already received a communication from Chicago warning him that if it was attempted to enforce unconstitutional laws the city would be flooded with literature by the American Secular Union. Then he assured his hearers that Robert G. Ingersoll was connected with that organization, evidently thinking that they are children to be frightened with the cry of "there's the black man!" We are glad to see that the Liberals of Chicago are wide awake to the necessities of the hour.

When Western Unitarian ministers go into Presbyterian churches to advocate Sunday laws, as Rev. H. T. Secrist did in Milwaukee, the dangers of "church union" must be apparent to the most careless Freethinker. With the Catholic, orthodox, and "Liberal Christian" united in one invading army, the outlook is sufficiently dark to cause the thoughtful citizen most grave concern.

Rev. E. D. Huntley, Methodist, said that Germany got its loose ideas of Sunday from Luther, which is indeed an admission; but when he added that Scotland's rigid Sabbatarianism had its source in John Knox, he was wide of the truth. Chambers's Encyclopedia says: "It is a mistake to suppose that either Sabbatarianism or asceticism was recommended by Knox." Andrews, in his "History of the Sabbath," remarks: "Though the foundation of the Presbyterian church of Scotland was laid by Knox, . . . and though that church is now very strict in the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, yet Knox himself was of Calvin's mind as to the observance of that day." (Calvin called Sabbath observance a "shadowy ceremony.") To this testimony is to be added that of Dr. Hessey in the Bampton Lectures: "Whatever the language held at present in Scotland may be [in regard to the Sabbath] it is certainly not owing to the great man whom the Scotch regard as the apostle of the Reformation in their country."

The pretense of "rest" was made much of by all the speakers in these meetings, but how hollow the cry was is proved by the attacks they made on Sunday recreations of all kinds. No intelligent working man will be caught by the gull's seed of "rest" which they so prodigally sow. Rev. Mr. White said that all who attended theaters and other places of amusement were law-breakers, and the presumption is that he would punish them as such. But the climax of potential immorality and malevolent suggestion was reached when Rev. Mr. Huntley said:

"Ingersoll laughed at God's killing a man for picking up sticks on the Sabbath. Well, that man might have been picking up sticks, but it was all the same with God if he had been picking up houses or continents or worlds. When they took the man they asked God what they should do with him, and he said: Stone him to death. The command to observe the Sabbath was as obligatory as any other of God's commands. It was a day set aside for a special holiness, a day of peculiar sacredness, and God had adjusted man's conscience to the day."

The New Haven colony made Sabbath-breaking punishable with death, and it is fair to assume that Rev. Mr. Huntley would do the same if he had the power; and, mind you, he would do this not because of the necessity for "rest," but because Sunday is a day "set aside for a special holiness," because it is a day "of peculiar sacredness," and God has "adjusted [Mr. Huntley's] conscience to the day." That play completely exposed the hand of the Sabbatarian gambler in human rights.

And there is still more showing of hands in both the East and the West. The legislature of poor old Massachusetts has just passed a drastic Sunday law forbidding all entertainments (except "sacred concerts") to which an admission fee is charged. Nobody but a minister has the right to earn money by Sunday work. Any person attending a prohibited entertainment is liable to a fine of five dollars. Here is one section of the law:

"Whoever, on the Lord's day, keeps open his shop, warehouse or workshop, or does any manual labor, business, or work, except works of necessity and charity, or takes part in any sport, game, or play, except a sacred concert, shall be punished by a fine of $50 for each offense, and the owner of any hall in which said law is violated is liable to a fine of $500."

Would it not be seemly to quit our jingo talk about "manifest destiny" and "the freest and greatest country on earth," and clean out some of our traitor legislatures? With our "large professions and little deeds" we are making ourselves the laughing stock of intelligent and justice-loving people the world over.

To end this review as we began it, with a report of Catholic affiliation with Protestants on the basis of Sabbath law aggressions, we have the following to tell: In St. Paul there has been formed a Catholic association called the "Sunday Law Observance League." The chairman of the Press Committee is Priest John Gmeiner, who has issued an address "To the W. C. T. U. and all friends of the American Sabbath," and this is signed by "Mrs. A. V. Nicholas, State Superintendent of Sabbath Observance." The address begins with a quotation from the "Sabbath for Man," by the Protestant theocrat, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, and is in the usual style of that kind of document. Father Gmeiner says that the Catholic movement "has been heartily indorsed and approved by the Methodist Episcopal ministers' meeting at St. Paul, March 25, and by the Baptist ministerial conference held about the same time in the same city." The leading Presbyterian minister of St. Paul has also indorsed it. At a mass meeting for the furtherance of this object, which was announced to be holden there on April 15, the editor of the Northwestern Chronicle (Catholic) was slated to preside. So we see that the leadership in what to the superficial observer has seemed to be only a Protestant Sunday observance crusade, is now assumed by the Catholic church. What an uncovering of hands! Do not the Covenanters see that they will be but a drop in the rising ocean of Catholicism? Or have they been deliberately playing for this? And what will the "patriotic" organizations, which up to the present time have not dared to lisp a word against the ominous menace of the Sunday law rebellion, have to say to this latest move of their dearest enemy?

A Little More Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to anything good.

Iowa is sadly bereaved of late. Within two years she has lost many of her most conspicuous and devoted Freethinkers. To the rapidly lengthening list is now to be added the veteran, J. L. Tompkins, of Lake City. He was one of the staunchest friends we had in that commonwealth, frank, fearless, and honest to the very core. To the services he rendered to humanity in the years of his physical vigor is now to be added the lesson he has taught in his death. He was prepared for the inevitable; he arranged that his obsequies should not give the lie to his life, and those charged with the duty of carrying into effect his wishes loyally did their part, as will be seen by reading the communication of his son-in-law, Mr. N. Zediker, in the "Letters of Friends." The best evidence that J. L. Tompkins taught wisely the lessons of Freethought is found in the fact that the provisions of his last testament, which he entrusted to his heirs, were faithfully executed.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

"An Important Intimation."

There are, we regret to say, between one thousand and two thousand of our friends who have allowed their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to expire without renewing. This is a considerably larger portion than is pleasant to us, who depend upon the more or less prompt payment of subscriptions for the wherewithal to meet our bills. Now, we are not going to get angry, or scold, or do anything disagreeable about this, but we must appeal to our friends' good nature and generous feelings to remedy this deplorable and unsatisfactory state of affairs. We need the money badly—so do our creditors. The paper man, and the printer, and the compositor, and the mailer, and the post-office collector, and the clerks, and the landlord, and the insurance man, and the gas man, and the devil are always with us, not to mention the rest, and they all want money and want it bad, and want it when it is due. And when we haven't got it for them life is a burden—they make it so intentionally, blast 'em.

So now, as aforesaid, we appeal to our friends all over this country—thousands of them—to send the amount of their arrearages and as much in advance as they have been behind, to sort of even things up and turn about in fair play, as it were. A year's subscription from each one whose time has expired will make us easy—very easy—but if we can't have that then let us have what you can spare, and we will "grin and bear it" until you get the balance. The amounts are small individually and easily raised, but to us they collectively mean a good deal—just the difference between being even with the world and being unpleasantly behind.

The disciples of a certain philosopher, one day missing their teacher from his accustomed place in the midst of them, sought him at his unpretentious lodgings, where they discovered that he was suffering from the lack of a Square Meal. Of course they hastened to provide him with all that the inner sinner could desire, but he nevertheless took occasion to jab them with a moral pointed by the event. "Know, then" (said he), "that in order that you may permanently enjoy the light of a lamp, it is necessary occasionally to replenish the Oil."

Delinquents who renew at once will be spared the moral which their remissness might tempt us to draw.

Misdirected Energy.

Is missionism a success? Is it likely ever to be a success? Mr. Henry Norman has written a book on the "Peoples and Politics of the Far East," being a record of travels and studies in China, Japan, Siam, and the various colonies of the European nations. In a late issue the New York Herald has a long review of the book, in the course of which it remarks:

"We are a little surprised at what Mr. Norman says of the results of missionary enterprise in China. He seems to have no faith that any good whatever is accomplished by these devoted men and women."

The Herald then quotes some of the traveler's statements in regard to foreign influence in that country. He asked a Roman Catholic priest who had long been in the country and who had achieved great victories and occupied a position of extraordinary power, "if he believed that missionary enterprise would result, even in the fulness of time, in anything that could be remotely described as the Christianizing of China. 'Jamais,' [never] he emphatically replied." Asked why he was there if that was his opinion, he answered:

"Simply in obedience to the command to preach the gospel to all peoples. Like the soldiers in the ranks, I obey the orders of my commander, without understanding in the least what good is to come of them."

Next Mr. Norman quotes from a paper read at Chefoo in September, 1888, by the Protestant, Rev. A. Williamson, D.D., on "Missionary Organization in China":

"The startling, though it is not the most serious, aspect of the question is that not only is heathenism extending, but immorality is increasing in all directions,

Those of us who have lived long enough in China see the evil spreading before our eyes, especially in and around our great emporiums, with an ever-widening area every year. The Chinese are learning evil faster than they are learning good. They are adding foreign vices to their own, aping foreign free living and habits, often in the most powerful manner; and the fact is that in and around our centers of commerce they are less honest, less moral, and less susceptible to the preaching of divine truth than formerly by a long way."

Which is equivalent to saying that the contact of Orientals with "Christian civilization" is productive of more harm than good. What, then, becomes of the claim that Christianity is the source of all that is good in civilization? Does not the admission of Dr. Williamson tend to sustain the contention of the Freethinker that we have attained to a certain stage of development in spite of religion, and that civilization is a matter of race and climate? More than this it tells to the student of sociology, for to him it emphasizes the truth that each race must grow into enlightenment under the laws of its own development, and that it is folly to try to force a people of one civilization to learn in one lesson the radically different civilization of another people. If they are ever to assimilate it it must be slowly, naturally.

It begins to look as though the Clerical party in the German Reichstag had overreached itself when it tried to tack on to the pending anti-Socialist bill amendments to destroy liberty of discussion concerning religion and marriage. Popular opposition to the bill is growing more and more pronounced, while the enemies of the bill within the Reichstag, under the able leadership of the Prince of Schoenarch-Carolath, have good grounds for hoping to unite against the obnoxious measure many even of the Conservatives and Free Conservatives, who are chafing under the growing power of the clericals.

Randolph-Macon College, at Ashland, Va., is a Methodist institution. For many years K. M. Smith has occupied its chair of Greek, Hebrew, and Sanscrit. It is now reported that he has resigned because of doubts concerning the divinity of Jesus and the inspiration of the scriptures—in fact, it is said that he does not believe in either. Evidently to lessen the influence of his defection, it is asserted that he is "rather erratic." The correspondent who makes the accusation explains it in this way:

"During the Virginia debt agitation some years ago Professor Smith proposed to take up a private collection and pay off the state's indebtedness. He actually contributed $1,200 of his own money for this purpose."

No wonder Professor Smith is not orthodox! A man who has such notions about debt-paying could not be expected to subscribe to the doctrine that "Jesus paid it all." Why, a preacher "erratic" as that might actually be guilty of believing that the churches should pay their own taxes instead of shifting the burden on to the shoulders of other people.

By what authority did the board of aldermen of New York pass and the mayor sign a resolution providing for the closing on Good Friday of all departments of the city government not required by law to be kept open? By what authority did the court of Oyer and Terminer and the court of General Sessions adjourn over that day? Why is there a bill now before the legislature of the state to make Good Friday a legal holiday? No law-making power in the state or nation has the shadow of a right to set apart a religious holy day as a holiday. But we are placed at a terrible disadvantage in antagonizing the schemes of the Catholics by the fact that the Protestants have forced us to accept one Catholic holy day as a holy day, not as a holiday. We refer, of course, to the legal recognition of the claims of the church regarding Sunday. This was the entering wedge, and when it was driven home the way was opened for all the saints' days in the calendar.

The Independent, with its usual obliviousness of facts, says of its recent "Lincoln number":

"Doubtless it will be the pleasure of many ministers to give a reading from this special number to their Christian Endeavor or Epworth League Society, or to their general congregation on a Sunday evening, illustrating the character of President Lincoln, his goodness of heart, and how, in the most troublous times that the nation has seen since the Revolutionary war, he conducted its affairs with the quietness and calmness of one who felt that he was only the agent of God in accomplishing a great work."

We hope that before those ministers touch too strongly upon Lincoln's alleged agency for divinity they will send here and get John E. Remsburg's book, "Abraham Lincoln: Was he a Christian?" If, after reading that work, they believe that Lincoln believed that he was God's agent, on a commission, we can only hope that they will speedily subject themselves to an examination as to their mental condition. We sell the book to ministers at the same price as to men who pay their own way and are of some use in the world.

The Youth's Companion gives Professor Morse as the authority for this touching sketch of Japanese treatment of other forms of life:

"Birds build their nests in the city houses, wild fowl, geese, and ducks alight in the public parks, wild deer trot about the streets. He had actually been followed by wild deer in the streets, nibbling melon rind out of his hand, as tame as calves and lambs on our farms. A dog goes to sleep in the busiest streets; men turn aside so as not to disturb him. One day a beautiful heron alighted on the limb of a tree, and the busy, jostling throng stopped. No one attempted to injure the bird, but several began sketching him."

Does any sane person suppose that there is the most remote possibility that Christian missionaries can in the least improve the ethical standards of such a people? We need their missionaries, not they ours. Imagine if you can a wild deer straying into an American town and escaping with its life! Imagine a crowd of Christians giving an artist time to sketch a heron sitting in a tree-top in any of our cities! Why, our Christian sportsmen think that it is "fun" to go down to the beach and wantonly mangle and murder the beautiful gulls and other sea birds. Christians! withdraw your missionaries from Japan; you are doing far worse than "carrying coal to Newcastle."

The Open Court, referring to the posthumous work of Professor Romanes, in which is found the record of his reversion to Christianity, says:

"We can no longer denounce reason, or silence our intellectual needs, for it is God himself who speaks in the voice of reason, and the progress of science is his most glorious revelation which ecclesiasticism cannot smother. Indeed, the suppression of reason is the sin against the Holy Ghost, which cannot be forgiven, but will inevitably lead, if persisted in, to eternal perdition."

Dr. Carus has done some very good work, but such misleading utterances as these cannot be included therein. We do not know if there is a God, we do not know that if he exists he speaks in the voice of reason, we do not know that the progress of science is his revelation, we do not know anything about Holy Ghosts nor about sins against them nor about eternal perdition. Experience has shown us that it is better to use our reason and to cultivate our undisciplined love of the marvelous; that the revelations of science are more useful and beautiful than the so-called revelations of theology, and that the suppression of reason injures the individual and the race. When the truth is thus simply stated all can understand it. Let us be done with unmeaning mysticism.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG lectured in St. Louis April 19th.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening in German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street, New York, at 8 o'clock. Program for April:

April 26th—"Some Recent Advances in Science." Dr. R. G. Eccles.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Long Island Business College, South 8th street, between Bedford and Driggs avenues. Program for April:

April 23th—Debate, "Protection vs. Free Trade." Mr. Henry Nichols and Mr. Henry Rowley.

FRANKLIN STEINER will start on another lecture tour in May. He will speak in Hoople, N. D.; Pierson, Ia.; Red Jacket, Mich.; and Greenwood, Wis. Liberals in the vicinity of these places should write him at once to Box 882, Des Moines, Ia.

THE Ohio Liberal Society meets every Sunday evening in G. A. R. Hall, 115 W. Sixth st., Cincinnati. Program for April:

April 28th—"A Christian Truth vs. An Orthodox Myth." Atty. Stanley E. Bowdle.

Ingersoll and Sam Jones.

The visit of Colonel Ingersoll to St. Louis on the concluding day of the Sam Jones revival was a coincidence which suggested to the Globe-Democrat the interest which would attach to an interchange of views as to the motives and influences of the two men, each of whom possesses in so marked a degree the power of attracting and interesting large crowds. That each is sincere in his belief is generally admitted, and it is worthy of note that while each criticises the other freely neither attributes to the other any but the best of motives. The idea was to present both sides of the question fairly, and to reflect the opinions of the exponents of theories so diametrically opposed, and this has been accomplished with the cooperation of the two gentlemen. Mr. Jones was seen first. He was unwilling to say anything calculated to hurt the feelings of a man against whom, personally, he had no grievance. When it was explained that the Globe-Democrat wanted a review of Colonel Ingersoll's lectures and their influence on the community, rather than the lecturer himself, Mr. Jones submitted cheerfully, leant back in his chair, and told the reporter to "fire away." His argument that Ingersoll's teachings are calamitous because they are apt to encourage utter recklessness is given in his own words, some few of which were subsequently quoted to the lecturer whose reply was desired.

To interview Colonel Ingersoll at length was less easy. The colonel is known to have an occasional antipathy to interviewers, claiming that in more than one instance he has been incorrectly reported. It was also ascertained that he would not reach St. Louis before Sunday morning. He has so many old friends in St. Louis that he holds a series of receptions all day, when in the city, and it would obviously be impossible to secure his undivided attention for an hour. Hence it was resolved to intercept him on the way here, and a telegram was sent to Cincinnati as to his route, it being his custom to visit that city when on a lecturing tour and map out his route from that point. The only reply was a reference to New York, and from the lecturer's home it was learned that he was due at Springfield, Ill., Saturday evening. A reporter was accordingly sent on to the Illinois state capital to await Colonel Ingersoll's arrival and obtain the desired interview. The result of the trip will be found in the next column, and side by side are printed the views of the two popular talkers, with an interchange of good-humored criticism, interspersed with a great deal of well-expressed argument and exceptionally able logic.

Jones on Ingersoll.

"What do you think of Ingersoll and of the influence of his lectures?" asked a reporter of the Rev. Sam Jones as he sat in his room at the Southern Hotel, evidently only partially recovered from the exertions of preaching to 6,000 people the preceding evening.

Mr. Jones thought for a moment and then said: "The question is a very broad one, and cannot be answered in two or three words. Personally, Mr. Ingersoll is no doubt a genial gentleman. Physically he is fat, intellectually he is bright, morally there may be worse men, but theologically he is a bad egg."

"You have seen the picture of Ingersoll nursing his grandchild?"

"Yes, and I could not help feeling mighty sorry for the grandchild."

"Apart from his personality, what do you think is the moral influence of Mr. Ingersoll's lectures?"

"That is very easily answered. A visit of Mr. Ingersoll to any community is calamitous to all whom he reaches, and the worst of it is, he generally reaches the very class of people upon whom his teachings have the most baneful effect. No God, no Bible, no heaven, no hell, catches the masses of non-church-goers, and turns them over to recklessness. The lecturer forgets that they were not all reared in Christian homes and brought up under the cultivating influences which he himself enjoyed. They were not trained up in the virtues as he was by his godly father and mother. Whatever virtue Mr. Ingersoll possesses is a gift of grace or Christianity. Many parade his charity, his liberality and his love for home. He never got these elements as the gift of Infidelity. They are but the expressions of Christian elements that live in his character in spite of his Infidelity, and when he throws his teaching of no God, no Bible, no heaven, and no hell into the hearts and lives of others who have not been blessed by the help which Christianity gives us, he turns the whole human life into utter rot."

"How do you account for Mr. Ingersoll's power to attract large audiences?" was a question which the above criticism naturally suggested.

"His power to attract lies in his ability to shock," replied Mr. Jones, with more force and earnestness than he had hitherto displayed. "He is the devil's dynamo, and when a man stands upon the damp soil of a sinful life old Bob can turn a current on him that will almost make him leap out of his hide. Men love to be shocked. I have often thought of Colonel Ingersoll in his disclaimer of Christian virtues and his disbelief in God and the Bible as putting him pretty much in the attitude of a drummer's little girl, of whom a commercial traveler once told me. He said he found his little girl, on one of his visits home, sitting on the floor playing with her kitten. While loving and caressing it she said, 'Kitty, you are a sweet little kitty; I love you and I know who your mommer is. Old pussy is your mommer. She's a good old cat, and I love her, too. But, kitty, I don't know who your popper is, 'cause I never saw him. I s'pect your popper is a traveling man.' We all know from Mr. Ingersoll's doctrine who his mother is, morally speaking. Earth is his mother. I expect his father is a traveling man. Certainly nobody has ever seen him in these parts. They all say that Colonel Ingersoll is a jolly fellow. I don't know him personally, but I don't doubt that he is."

"How about Mr. Ingersoll's arguments?"

"He hasn't any. He is an orator of the first water. I know no man alive to-day who can put English together like he can. His words put into sentences look like streams of pearls; but they are merely bracelets and necklaces for swine. His philosophy and his religion do not build colleges, almshouses, or asylums. Neither do they take care of the poor, the maimed, and the halt. They are powerless to reform the drunkard and the outlaw. They do not make a man more kind in his home, or more respected in the community where he lives. He clamors for free thought and moral liberty. Establish the fact that men can think as they please, and with that you establish the fact that they can act as they please. There are boundary lines to thought, just as there are boundary lines to actions. With his wit and intellectual cunning, aided by his illogical reasoning, he may play upon the weaknesses of religion, and by his flights of eloquence upon the duties of life which he steals from Christianity; but, after all, a thoughtful, substantial man sees the cunning of his method and detects the direful effect his words have upon the gang that flock to hear him. Lord Salisbury said that but for the Salvation Army in the streets of London the police force would have to be increased four thousand in number in a single day. Remove Infidelity from the world, and you lessen the police force by one-half. Christianity is the great conserving and preserving force of the age. Anarchism and outlawism are legitimate children of Infidelity, and whatever and whoever contributes to these dangerous elements in society should be fought and outlawed by every true American citizen, whatever his creed may be."

"In other words, you mean that the influence of Mr. Ingersoll's lectures is, from your standpoint, entirely bad?"

"I see no good that can possibly come from his lectures on Infidelity. I see much harm that may result from them. I also see why Mr. Ingersoll delivers his lectures. There may be $1,000 a night to him in the job; but why a Christian community will suffer such a thing, and why men will pay for the privilege of hearing him abuse their mother's God and their father's Bible at a dollar a head, and then turn out and be Infidels like him for nothing, and board themselves, is one of the mysteries I never could solve. Personally, I have never met Colonel Ingersoll. He may have many charming characteristics; in fact, he must have. Reared, as he was, in a Christian home, he cannot be utterly depraved. The question is often asked as to whether Ingersoll is sincere in his denials, and in his negations, and in his Infidelity. Suppose we give him credit for all sincerity; he may be in that class of whom the Bible speaks when it says, 'Given over to a delusion that he may believe a lie and be damned.'"

"I believe a man can reach such a condition and attitude that in the moral world a lie is to him the truth, and the truth a lie. As to whether Colonel Ingersoll is sincere or not makes no difference when you look at the tendencies of his lecture. I see no reason why a profane swearer, or a liar, or a drunkard, or a whoremonger, or a voluptuary should find fault with Mr. Ingersoll, just as I see no reason why the good and true and beautiful and noble should champion his cause or approve his lectures. A man who starts out from the storm centers of Infidelity would become a cyclone in the moral world. The orator we are talking about is a cyclone, funnel-shaped and full of wind. I suppose he will die as he lived. But after death he will no longer be a disbeliever or an unbeliever. My Bible tells me that the devils believe and tremble."

"Do I understand you to say that Colonel Ingersoll really uses no argument?"

Mr. Jones tilted his chair back, deliberated longer than is usual with such a remarkably good conversationalist as he is known to be, and finally said: "That is about so. I have never thought that Mr. Ingersoll treats the subject in hand fairly. He starts in by making his own statement as to what Christianity is, and he then proceeds to demolish the man of straw which he himself has set up. He would burn down my cabin and then offer me no shelter for myself and wife and children. He would destroy the old ford and build no bridge in its place. He would extinguish what he calls my tallow candle of hope and leave me in despair and darkness. He would make me what he calls a free man by giving me license of thought and action, when any sensible man knows that license is simply power to do wrong. True liberty, on the other hand, is simply the privilege of doing right. The ten commandments make the boundary lines within which liberty is given. Infidelity would change these so that they would read: 'Thou shalt not steal—if there is any probability of being caught.' 'Thou shalt not commit adultery—but you may find two or three wives more convenient than one.' 'Thou shalt not break the Sabbath—but bend it double as occasion offers.' 'Thou shalt not covet—but get all you can and keep all you get.' 'Thou shalt have no other gods before me—but if you don't like the God of heaven, be one yourself and run things to suit yourself.' What a man does is at least a test of what he is. Will Mr. Ingersoll show us what he has done to make the world better or happier; where he has reformed a single drunkard, reclaimed a single reprobate, purified a single life, or elevated a single community? Mr. Ingersoll seems to be the product of hyper-Calvinism, for Infidelity is nothing more nor less than hyper-Calvinism gone to seed. God will reign, heaven will endure, the ministry will live, the churches will flourish, morality will be taught and practiced, and Christian virtues will be embodied in men long after Mr. Ingersoll and his company have passed from earth, and received the reward of their doing."

Ingersoll on Jones.

After obtaining the views of Rev. Sam Jones on Colonel Ingersoll and the influence of his lectures and teachings, the Globe-Democrat sent a stenographer to the latter, as already explained, with instructions to ask questions as nearly identical as possible with reference to views entertained as to the Georgia revivalist and his methods. It was impossible to carry out the instructions literally, as Mr. Ingersoll, after a little hesitancy, finally warmed to the subject, anticipated queries, and really delivered a very forcible lecture on the question of revivals past and present, with a very lucid definition of Agnosticism as compared with Atheism, and more especially immorality or indifference as to right and wrong. The colonel was in the best of humors, told each friend who was admitted to the room that he was in perfect health and was carrying his sixty-one years without an effort, and assured the interviewer that he had nothing of any particular interest to say about Sam Jones or any other religious enthusiast. When pressed for an answer to the question, "What do you think of Mr. Jones and of the influence of his preaching?" he at length said:

"Assuming that the gentleman's sermons are correctly reported, and basing my opinion on what little of them I have read, I cannot say that I particularly admire the style, though the argument does not appear to differ very much from those which revivalists have used ever since I can remember. When I was a boy the people had very few amusements. There were no theaters in the smaller towns, no museums, and nothing in the way of entertainment except the traveling circus which came round once a year. This circus generally carried a few mangy-looking animals, so that religious people could have a satisfactory excuse for going. In the winter the little towns were cut off from the rest of the world. There were no railroads, the rivers were frozen, and the mail arrived about once in every week. As a result, the people amused themselves every winter in 'getting religion.' The towns would be invaded by two or three evangelists who derived great pleasure from exciting their audiences by vivid descriptions of the future home of the unconverted. They would describe the caverns of hell into which rolled and dashed the waves of brimstone, and also the tortures and agonies inflicted by the worm that never dies. These meetings were held every evening and the people were invited to come forward to the 'anxious seat' very much as they have been asked every evening for the last two or three weeks in St. Louis."

"I remember that the first to come forward were generally the little girls, who, recalling that they had pilfered a little sugar, or perhaps a piece of cake, felt conscience-smitten, and were hence the first to respond. Then some of the men would join in the procession, and some few would be converted every evening amidst great rejoicing. This thing would last about a month, and nothing was talked about except religion. The majority of the people were about half-crazy—the preachers altogether so. They would convert from fifty to one hundred, and then when business brisked up in the spring and people began to resume their usual vocations most of the converts would backslide. But, in justice to them, I must add that the following winter they would be on hand again, ready to reoccupy the anxious-seat. Nearly every town had what you might call a stock company of periodical converts, who went through the same experience every winter, told how wicked they had been, how happy they were, how ashamed they were of having backslidden and how gratified they were to be again redeemed."

"Did they become better citizens?"

"I never knew anybody to become better by being what Mr. Jones and other orthodox preachers call 'converted.' On the contrary, I have known many young generous fellows who got religion and immediately became sour, unsociable, and mean. There is a conversion, if I may use the word, which comes in the nature of things. There is a time in the life of a young man when he feels responsibility touching him, when he makes up his mind to leave the follies of youth and become a man, with a goal fixed in his mind. This often comes when he falls in love and feels that he wishes to do something for somebody else. This is what I call genuine conversion, not born of excitement, or bad air, or an overheated room, or an idiotic impulse. We may go a step farther and say that the same thing happens with animals. There comes a time when the colt quits kicking over the traces and goes to pulling and eating his oats like a well-regulated horse, and when the dog quits chasing his tail, begins to look dignified, and assumes an air of partnership with the proprietor."

"Do you think the influence of Mr. Jones's revivals is injurious?"

Yes, I think the so-called religious revival is hurtful as well as useless. The methods used are calculated to excite, not to enlighten. There is no appeal to the judgment; the reasoning faculties are not called into play. The passions are aroused, and especially the fear of punishment and the hope of reward. Thousands and thousands of men and women have been excited to such a degree that they become partially insane—many wholly so. Religious excitement has unsettled as many minds as any other cause, and the asylums to-day are filled with men and women who have lost their reason in consequence of these foolish revivals, conducted by orthodox ministers. Men and women are made to believe that they have offended an infinite God; that they have hurt the feelings of the Holy Ghost; that their actions here, and especially their beliefs, are to have eternal consequences; that they deserve to be eternally damned for what they have done, and that God is anxious to damn them, but is held back by his son, who seems to have a little more mercy than is credited to the old gentleman himself.

"They are also told that they can have an eternal reward of infinite joy if they only repent and believe in this son. In the conflict of emotions produced by these idiotic sermons, many, as I said before, have lost their reason. If the sermons of Mr. Jones or any other revivalist could be answered from the same platform by a philosopher, by a humanitarian, or by a man of sense, no human being would ever be 'converted.' Such a proceeding would end forever the revival system."

"Another great fault of these revivals is that people are told that those who do right have to carry a cross, while those who do wrong have the benefit of the pleasures of this world—that the wicked have their good time here, while the good suffer on account of their goodness and self-denial, but will be rewarded in another world. All this is not only idiotic, but it is positively immoral. The facts are exactly the reverse. Only those carry a cross who do wrong. On the shoulders of those who do right the cross changes, and the man is borne upward and onward."

"That is the true philosophy of life. Men should act right because right action pays; men should shun wrong because wrong inflicts and produces suffering. Everything is moral that tends to increase or to preserve human happiness and human well-being; everything is immoral that decreases or puts in peril human well-being. In other words, all that preserves or increases happiness is right. There is no necessity for being miserable here in order to secure happiness in this world, and if you are really happy in this life, happy by virtue of living consistently and doing right, there is no danger of being damned in another world. I know of no form of orthodox religion that contains any philosophy, and I never knew of a philosopher occupying a pulpit."

"In one of his recent sermons Sam Jones said that the terms 'Agnostic' and 'fool' were synonymous. What is your reply to that criticism or statement?"

Mr. Ingersoll laughed good-humoredly and said: "Coming from the Georgia evangelist, I think the remark calls for no reply, and it is certainly no argument. It is a curious fact that the savages are perfectly certain about things that philosophers admit are beyond the limitations of the human mind. The savage of central Africa knows all about his god or gods. He knows just how the world was made and how the human race was started. He knows exactly where we are all going after death. He doesn't know anything about this world, but he does know all about the other two worlds. He doesn't know anything about man, but he knows all about the gods. Now, if the Rev. Sam Jones would just think for a few moments he would probably admit that he doesn't know that any god exists at all. No doubt he believes it, but he certainly does not know it, and if he is honest enough to admit the truth he admits that he is an Agnostic, or, to use the word he seems to prefer, a fool."

"I confess that I don't know whether a God exists or not. This is the only world I have ever lived in or have any memory of, so that I might be called a provincialist. That there may be other worlds, I don't deny. There may be a God. There may be many. If there is one I hope there are more, for one would be so lonesome. I don't know the origin of the universe, having no evidence on the subject. It is beyond my mind. I cannot conceive of the creation of something from nothing, nor can I conceive of something being changed back again to nothing. In other words, I cannot conceive creation and consequently cannot conceive a creator. I don't say there is no God—I simply say I don't know. So far as my acquaintance extends I can truthfully say I never met a minister who did. Mr. Jones may be in the possession of facts of which I am ignorant, but if he knows there is a God I would like to have him tell his next congregation how he knows and what his evidence is."

"Mr. Jones says an Agnostic is the same as a fool. The difference between an Agnostic and a fool is about this: The Agnostic doesn't know. He has sense enough to know he doesn't know, and honesty enough to admit it. A fool, on the other hand, says he knows, whether he really thinks he does or not. Now, I am not prepared to admit that Humboldt was a fool, yet he said he didn't know whether there was a God or not. Few men would call Louis Agassiz a fool, yet he said that science had not advanced far enough to say with any certainty whether God exists or not. I don't think Darwin was a fool, yet he stated distinctly that the questions of God and immortality were beyond the limits of his powers of reasoning. Ernst Haeckel, the greatest naturalist in the world, is no fool, yet he says he doesn't know. Does Mr. Jones suggest that Huxley was ever a fool? As a matter of fact, he is the man who invented this definition of Agnosticism as representing this certain stage of thought. As a matter of fact, the greatest thinkers and scientists of this century have adopted this position, and I don't think that the fact of the Rev. Sam Jones denouncing them as fools will have even a tendency toward dimming the splendor of their reputation."

The next question put to Colonel Ingersoll was the following: "What have you to say in answer to the contention of Mr. Jones that the moral influence of your lectures is calamitous, especially among those who have not had the benefit of being reared in a Christian home, as you were?"

Without hesitating a moment longer than was necessary to shake hands with an old friend who entered the room while the question was being asked, the colonel replied: "Mr. Jones evidently doesn't possess a clear conception of morality, or he would not insinuate that what I say has an immoral tendency. He seems to think that certain beliefs are essential to morality, that it is moral to believe in the supernatural, in the inspiration of the Bible, in the atonement, and in the scheme of redemption; and immoral to believe in absolute liberty of thought—immoral to advocate investigation and the use of the natural reasoning power that we possess. He seems to regard blind credulity as moral, and intellectual courage of thought as immoral. I, on the other hand, think morality lives in the domain of action rather than in the realm of belief. A man may accept a creed blindly and at the same time be a very immoral person, while, on the other hand, if a man is really moral it makes but little difference what creed he may accept or deny. Every religion preaches ordinary morality, and in addition to this, the necessity of belief in certain supernatural things and the observance of certain ceremonies. Now, if you were to take morality from religion nothing of any value would be left; whereas, if you take from morality itself its religion, it would remain just as valuable as ever, and even more valuable."

"I deny having said anything in my lectures that is calculated to make people immoral. I have told them that the Bible is not inspired, but that what is true in it is just as good as if it had been; while the bad in it could not be made good by being inspired. I have told people that men wrote the book called the Bible, and that it is full of the ignorance of the times in which it was written. Also, that some of the things in it are noble and lofty, while it also contains things that are cruel, heartless and even infamous. I have said that we should throw away the bad and preserve the good. I have told every one to be honest with himself and to express his opinions honestly. I have warned my hearers against being controlled by prejudice or educational influences, and I have also said that the world was for the living and not for the dead, but that each one should live in accordance with his ideal. I have said all in my power in favor of intellectual liberty, I have spoken in favor of all that is good, and just, and generous, and noble. I deny that I have ever uttered a word calculated to make any one immoral."

"I have not been guilty of the inconsistency of telling people they can act like devils for seventy years, and then be forgiven in a moment, and be carried up to heaven by hosts of angels. Such a doctrine is immoral. I don't tell the cashier of a bank that it is wrong to steal, and then add that if he steals every dollar in the vault he can repent and be forgiven as well in Canada as in the United States; neither do I tell him that when he repents there will be more joy in heaven than over ninety and nine honest cashiers who never stole a dollar. That doctrine is immoral, but it is not mine. Neither do I tell people that they are accountable for the sins of a couple of people who lived 6,000 years ago, and that they can be justly punished for offenses they never committed. That would be immoral. Nor have I told people that they can get to heaven by the virtues of another man, or that another man or God can be good and they can get the credit for it. That, too, would be immoral."

I have not told people that they ought to become heavenly paupers and enjoy the glories of another world purchased for them by another person. That would be immoral. But I have told them that if they would be happy they must earn happiness; that happiness cannot be received as alms; that as a fact happiness is the interest which decent actions draw; that they must be good for themselves. I have also told people that there is no such thing as forgiveness; that everybody has to bear the consequences of his own acts, and that these consequences are a universal police whom nobody can bribe and no one avoid. That is moral, and in addition to being moral it is true."

"I have never told any one that a God of infinite wisdom and goodness could make hundreds of millions of people, knowing that they would be eternally damned. That would be immoral, because it makes the God revivalists talk about a monster. A God of infinite wisdom and power has no right to make a failure, and certainly a man who is born to eternal damnation can hardly be called a success."

"If I could change a stone into a human being, knowing that he would be a murderer and be hanged before he could get religion, and hence, according to orthodoxy, go to hell, I think I might far better leave the stone alone. If God makes people out of dust and knows they will be damned, he had far better leave the dust alone. I don't think that any God has a right to add to the misery of mankind. To think otherwise seems to me to amount to an insinuation that God is a monster and a savage."

"In other words, Colonel Ingersoll, while Sam Jones thinks the tendency of your lectures is immoral, you think the criticism applies more accurately to his preaching?"

"I don't want to criticize any one man in particular," was the reply. "The religion of our day is immoral. Most of the sermons preached are immoral, and, as a rule, they are subversive of the aims and ends of justice. I do honestly think that if we had a few less sermons and a few more lectures of a sensible kind the world would actually grow better, brighter, and happier."

"Do you think the revivals of to-day are as useless and hurtful as those you have described as being held when you were a boy?"

"In answer to that I would say we are passing through a change. People are slowly becoming more and more thoughtful, and I think the evangelist will, in consequence, soon become a thing of the past. The preacher of the future will be a teacher. He will be one of the high priests of nature, and he will tell people how to live in this world and how to enjoy the sunshine of this life. The sensational exhorters will have to go to the rear. They are no longer useful, if they were ever so. They are, indeed, a hindrance. Only a little while ago, in Spain, the people who were afflicted with cholera mobbed the doctors, looted the drug stores, and relied upon religious processions to stay the pestilence. They were behind the times, just as is the revivalist who tries to stay the onward march of crime by appealing to heavens or hells. He is pursuing the same course, with a certainty of achieving the same results. The world is beginning to see that people act and think for themselves under the circumstances of the hour, and to realize that to improve people their condition must be changed. This can be done only by developing the brain and civilizing the heart. We must convince the people that wrong doing is an ignorant blunder, that to get right is an effort of intelligence, and when these thoughts are firmly embodied in the minds of the people there will be no further use for medicin men, for augurs, or for evangelists. To appeal to the supernatural will be useless.

"When that time comes man will cease to think that a God controls the forces of this world, and man will become the providence of man."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Campaign Work.

The work of the Federation and Union will be pushed forward as vigorously as possible with the means at hand. Mrs. Freeman, the secretary, will make a tour westward as far as Arizona, where the flame of Freethought is now burning brightly, and where Secularism has a broad and open field. Mrs. Freeman will be at Trinidad, Colorado, May 4th and 5th; at San Marcial, N. M., May 7th, 8th, 9th; at Tucson, Arizona, May 12th to the 16th; at Tempe and Phoenix, May 17th, 19th, and at Prescott and vicinity until June. Returning, Mrs. Freeman will be at Albuquerque, Santa Fe, Trinidad; Marysville and Topeka, Kansas, and will travel via the Santa Fe route, and it is hoped that Liberals along this line will take advantage of the opportunity to secure her services and push the work. It is important to maintain the Freethought platform, for only by the platform can we reach and arouse the masses of the people. While Mrs. Freeman is lifting up our flag on the Western frontier, I shall be pursuing my journey across the waters to the splendid host of the Old World, where shall be gathered hope, courage, and knowledge for many a battle to come. I do not intend to throw off the harness. I believe that this liberal intercourse between the Old World and the New will be an immense benefit to the cause in every land, but to us especially in this country will the illustrious record of the lands of our ancestry broaden and deepen our efforts for mental liberty and progress. We need to be cosmopolitan in this great work of intellectual and political emancipation.

Meanwhile E. C. Reichwald will hold the fort at 141 South Water st., Chicago. Please send in your contributions. We wish to push the circulation of the "Federation and Union" pamphlet. It is useful. Besides, we have work to do in the Wise and Flecken matters, and the Sabbatarians are rushing things with fanatical vigor. All over the country Sabbath laws are being enacted and enforced. We must be prepared to fight at an early date the National Sabbath law, now before Congress. I know that times are hard, but we cannot afford to let our national organization haul down its colors. We must have the means to maintain our forces. Our membership is increasing, and if we only have the treasury to support us we can do a great work. Do not fail to communicate with E. C. Reichwald, and lend a hand.

We expect to hold the next national congress at New York, and we look forward to a grand rally of the Eastern Liberals, so that East and West will be united in more cordial relations than ever.

Let us look to the future. I believe the summer's work will bring us to the fall campaign with added strength and enthusiasm, and that our ranks will be more united than ever, and the means at hand more effectual for co-operation and advance.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Feels Happily Paired.

I rejoice to see "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," compiled by me, and first published in 1860, now going hand-in-hand with Paine's "Age of Reason," both at reduced prices. I feel that I am happily paired.

W. H. BURR.

IS THE 'HOLY BIBLE' UNMAILABLE?

That is to be Made the Issue in the J. B. Wise Prosecution.

ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL ON DEMURRER.

Motion Made to Quash the Indictment—United States Attorney Perry Ventured No Reply, but Judge Foster Did So without Achieving Distinguished Success—A Test Case upon the Result of Which Many Others Depend.

The case of the United States vs. Jacob B. Wise was called for trial on the 11th instant in the United States District Court for the Eastern Division of Kansas. The attorney for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Adolph Bierck, of New York, appeared on behalf of Mr. Wise, and succeeded in raising questions of law so that the responsibility for the determination whether or not the particular verse of the Bible involved is obscene and indecent shall rest upon the shoulders of the judge, and not upon those of an instructed jury.

Mr. Wise's counsel, after a consultation, determined not to raise any question of fact. There was no need of denying any of the allegations of the indictment except the one charging the obscenity of the passage, and that issue was tried as a question of law.

Mr. Bierck took the ground that Mr. Wise had done all that the indictment charged, but that nevertheless he had committed no offense, was guilty of no crime, and had done only that which it was his right to do.

A demurrer was therefore interposed, and in order to bring up all the questions so that in the event of an adverse decision an appeal might be maintained, a motion to quash the indictment was also made. Mr. Bierck's argument was largely technical. He accepted the situation created by the long train of decisions under the Comstock laws, and showed that a conviction of Wise must carry with it, as a corollary, the exclusion from the mails of every book containing the obnoxious passage, and the conviction of those mailing it. Mr. Bierck said:

"The poet Goethe was once invited to attend a conference of ministers at Kiel, called for the purpose of suppressing obscene literature. Goethe suggested that they begin with the Bible, and the conference adjourned. The work thus prematurely abandoned by the conference has been taken up by an evangelist clergyman in Industry, Kansas, and he now, through the medium of this prosecution, invokes the jurisdiction of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern Division of Kansas to sustain him in his contention that this particular verse of the scriptures is obscene and indecent, and is unfit for transmission through the mails.

"You will observe that this case differs materially from the numerous other cases which have arisen under the statute by virtue of which the defendant is indicted, in that it does not call for the services of one who can qualify as an expert in what may be termed sexual jurisprudence. This case presents no such question. There is nothing in the language used which contains any suggestion of immorality, and if judged by the self-same tests which were adopted in the Bennett case, as confirmed in a score of later decisions, it will be found to be neither obscene nor indecent.

"Obscene matter, as defined originally in the case of the Queen vs. Hicklin, which was followed in the Bennett case, is such matter as tends to excite libidinous thoughts or impure desires or to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are subject to such influences and into whose hands the matter may fall. Indecent matter is such as is calculated to promote the violation of law and the general corruption of morals."

Counsel cited here a number of decisions and demonstrated that, although the language used was extremely coarse and vulgar, it did not come within the terms of the definition. He also showed that both the statutes and the decisions declared that it made no difference whether the matter was written or printed, sealed or unsealed; that it was not necessary that a book or publication should be obscene or indecent in its entirety or purpose to be obnoxious to the statutes, and that it sufficed if it contained a single obscene or indecent passage.

"Yet here," said Mr. Bierck, "we have the anomalous situation of a Christian minister in an assumedly Christian court attacking as obscene and indecent a passage which occurs substantially twice in the book which is revered and venerated as divinely inspired by the believers in the religion of which he is a priest. From its very inception this prosecution is absurd. It ought never to have been permitted to go beyond the office of the attorney for the United States. It ought never to have been permitted to cross the threshold of the grand jury room. To highten, were it possible, the intense absurdity of the ridiculous prosecution, the learned assistant to the attorney for the United States has himself been guilty of the same offense for which this defendant is now put on trial. He is in the same boat with the defendant. I hold in my hand a copy of the identical verse mailed by the assistant United States attorney to Mr. Wise."

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY PERRY: I think that I shall have to admit that I am an accessory before the fact.

MR. BIERCK: I do not think that I shall have you indicted yet.

JUDGE FOSTER: There you see a distinction. It makes a great difference that Mr. Mason sent this in the course of business and in response to a request.

MR. BIERCK: It was in the course of business and in response to Anthony Comstock's request that Bennett mailed the book on which he was convicted.

THE COURT: I don't want to hear anything about Anthony Comstock or what he did.

MR. BIERCK: I presume not.

THE COURT: Mr. Mason is not in the business of circulating such matter.

MR. BIERCK: Neither does the indictment so charge Mr. Wise, and your honor has no right to make such an accusation from the bench.

Counsel then pointed out that the particular verse in question had already been declared mailable by the post-office department, and that although the official declaration of the assistant attorney general was not sufficient, perhaps, strictly to bring the case within the principle of "Stare decisis," yet as this was a criminal prosecution and the statute of a highly penal character, it should be strictly construed; and if there was any doubt, even the slightest, as to whether an offense was committed or not, the defendant was entitled to its benefit. Counsel then read Attorney-General Tyner's letters which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1895, holding that the Bible and an abridgment, consisting of a collection of its reprehensible passages, including the one in question, were mailable.

The remainder of the argument consisted of a careful examination of the decided cases in their present application, and showed conclusively that it must be a straining of the law alone that can warrant the conviction of Mr. Wise, for he is not indicted under the act of 1888, which deals rather with the offense of criminal libel, but under the old Comstock act of 1873, which deals with obscenity and indecency.

The attorney for the United States did not venture to engage in any argument in open court, but merely asked Judge Foster for time to submit a brief, and promised to send a copy to Mr. Wise's counsel, who submitted at that time a brief on behalf of his client.

The outlook seems to be that the demurrer will be overruled and an appeal will be taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals. In the mean time Mr. Wise is still out on bail, and his counsel has secured the agreement of the United States Attorney and the Court that he will not be rearrested and that the amount of his bail will not be increased.

This is virtually the first of this class of cases, and it has been selected as a test case, for it is said that there are about twenty-five other cases held in abeyance pending the decision of this one.

News and Notes.

It was a renewal of old-time campaign fervors to address again the Manhattan Liberal Club. This is the focus of many a brilliant light, and its illumination has gone all over the land. This Club is an educational force, and we can say:

Age cannot wither nor custom stale
Its infinit variety.

The audiences are as alert, as inquisitive, as critical, as pugnacious, as eloquent, and as appreciative as ever. It is always a pleasure to greet the intellectual athlete, and to receive philosophical blows straight from the shoulder. It stirs the blood and prepares one for any fate. If one can face the Liberal Club he need not fear thereafter god, man, or devil. This Club well illustrates the glorious aphorism of Ingersoll, "Better the storm and tempest of thought and action than the dead calm of ignorance and faith." There is "no dead calm" in the Liberal Club, while with the "storm and tempest" there is plenty of sunshine and glory.

I gave my lecture on "Bible and Modern Thought," and the occasion to me was a stimulating one, not only in giving the address itself, but in the reception of the thoughts of others who have passed along the same line of investigation, and were able to illuminate the subject from a different point of view. Long life to the Liberal Club and its splendid comradeship.

The Brooklyn Philosophical Association is my next point of vantage. Here, indeed, in the City of Churches, one seems to stand upon the heights of civilization and behold the triumph of philosophy and science over ignorance and superstition. Our brave leader, Rowley, is admirably adapted to maintain the prestige of this advanced company, who are constantly on the march, and find no permanent camping-ground for the human intellect.

I gave a lecture on "The Uses of Philosophy," and it was probably, take it all round, the most radical lecture I have given, but I found that it was cordially accepted on its merits, as an appeal to reason and experience and not to any authority, theological, philosophical, or otherwise. The two grand uses of philosophy, as distinct from natural science, are to teach—first, what can we know? and, second, what ought we to do?

Under the first head, a true philosophy removes from the domain of human investigation the words "infinite," "absolute," "efficient cause," underlying unknown "substance," either of material or mental phenomena, "noumenon" and the "unknowable."

Clearing away these stumbling-blocks, we have simply material and mental phenomena, known only by sensation and reflection, but really known as they are. In the original act of consciousness we know both the me and the not-me, and upon this original duality of consciousness is built all the true knowledge of man of the material world as things and processes, in the relations of time and space; of the mental world, as a process, not an entity, in the relations of time but not of space.

Of course, true philosophy, as well as true science, will result in Atheism and Materialism. There can be no other conclusion. It must be conceded that material phenomena are the antecedent of mental phenomena, and while material phenomena are everywhere in time and space, as we experience it and know it, mental phenomena occupy but a very small portion of universal existence. So far as we know such phenomena are only on this planet.

On the basis of this mental philosophy, which takes in the human mind and the world, there is the philosophy of life, of history, and of reform in accordance with the great modern doctrine of evolution. It teaches that man must depend upon himself, that he is a living power in evolution, that the present is connected with all the past, and out of the present flows all the future. The true political reform must be in the individuals and not in the masses. The best form of government is valueless without a commonwealth of freethinking, scientific men and women. Freethought is, therefore, the supreme reform.

I was glad to find that President Rowley, in his able address on this occasion, fully agreed with my fundamental points, although we had never compared notes on the matter. This shows that those who try to think clearly, and without prejudice, are pretty sure to come to the same conclusion, and that truth therefore is not simply individual, but universal, a common possession reached by common methods.

Bidding farewell to the many comrades of the Brooklyn Association, I wend my way over to Newark and here greet another company of stalwarts, with President Bird at the front. I give my lecture, "Rome or Reason—Which?" It was followed by a lively discussion, participated in by a Roman Catholic who, as usual, gave the lie to all my statements, but, fortunately, he could not use the sword.

The Newark League is progressing. I couldn't have found a better audience for my farewell lecture. I had the hearty hand-shake and the good wishes of all for my voyage.

I spent the evening after the lecture with Mr. Bird and family, where the Secular Pilgrim is always regaled with good things. I was glad to meet the little Infidel, Eva Ingersoll Bird, fifteen months old, whose fair face, bright eyes, and jolly laugh betoken her a true descendent of Freethought ancestry. These pleasant visions of friendship will accompany me on my journey, and make me look forward to a joyous return from the glories of the Old to those of the New.

Besides those who have already lent a hand to this international union of Freethought forces, are Dr. W. T. Carter, A. Burstrom, J. E. Palanca, A. W. Cheever, J. E. Martin, L. Schlegel, Ira Adams, Andrew Beveridge, Mrs. L. P. Longley, Wm. J. Jones, B. Anderson, Jonathan Wells, J. T. Johnson, Henry Bird, Thos. Tripp, Wm. Bondies, E. B. Foote, Jr., Joseph Wenzel, John Diamond, L. D. Crine, "A Friend," Robert Thorne, William Smith, and Thomas Holly. I feel assured of generous support both on this side and the other side of the Atlantic, and I shall do my level best to make this journey a golden, shining link of friendship and good will. My next letter to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be from across the "great pond." I shall describe my voyage through storm and calm. I would like to see the Atlantic in its fury and survive to tell of it in "News and Notes."

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Observations.

The case of the Kansas man who committed a murder and escaped the penalty of his crime on the plea that he was hypnotized by a neighbor, who has since been convicted, gives the Dallas News a chance to inquire if we are going back to the days of sorcery. Following this precedent, the News says, the phrase "Being thereunto moved and instigated by the devil," appearing in the indictment, furnishes grounds for acquittal. That is logical provided that "Being hypnotized and thereunto impelled," or words to that effect, appeared in the indictment of the Kansas homicide, which is probably not the fact. The acquittal of the accused was based on his own testimony that a certain man had controlled his actions through hypnotic influence; and that man was thereupon brought to trial and condemned. But the case is still provocative of thought, for it is only a few years ago that a citizen of Massachusetts murdered his own offspring, and still fewer years since another individual assassinated the president of the United States, both testifying under examination that they were thereunto inspired by one Jehovah. The assassination was thus Jehovah's second offense in this country, while sacred history convicts him of many more elsewhere. Applying the Kansas precedent, or rather subsequent, there should have been an indictment found against the hypnotizer. In ignorance of his full name, Jehovah Doe would have answered the purpose of the legal instrument, although due and diligent research might have failed to reveal his whereabouts. The least the authorities could do in the circumstances, it seems to me, would be to offer a reward for his apprehension and to warn the public against his malign influence. But what course did they pursue? They put Freeman in a lunatic asylum, hanged Guiteau, and thanked God for everything. But Jehovah should avoid Kansas.

In one of his lectures Colonel Ingersoll tells the story of a Catholic who murdered a laboring man and ate his sandwiches, throwing away the meat because the day was Friday, when it is irreligious to eat flesh. I have always regarded the story as a parable, but it might have been the record of an actual occurrence. At a rifle range in this city, last Sunday, Charles Schwab, treasurer of the Germania Schützen Bund, was shot in the head by a customer who was firing at a target. The shooter was not taken into custody, but the police arrested the man in charge of the gallery for violation of the Sunday law!

The Rev. Wm. R. Goss, a Methodist minister of Kingston, N. Y., was tried a few days ago on charges of immorality; a certain Miss Craft, described as a beautiful young girl, being mentioned in the indictment. Goss was found guilty on general principles, but the girl cleared herself by procuring the testimony of four physicians that she was innocent. How much such testimony is worth everybody is at liberty to guess, for few doctors would testify against the character of a young girl on the strength of what they might be able to ascertain in the way indicated. But have we not a great system of jurisprudence when women may be subjected to that sort of inspection in order to whitewash the character of some rake of a parson? Indeed we have. Even if the doctors had not found what Goss's lawyer called the "sign manual of Almighty God as to her purity," that would not have either cleared or incriminated him, for there are other men and women in the parish of Kingston. The girl was not on trial, but Goss, and it is probably a very fortunate thing for him and numerous other ministers that "the sign manual of Almighty God," whatever that is, cannot be put in evidence as to their own innocence or guilt. The Methodists of Kingston may have a right to know whether or not their pastor is a moral man, but neither they nor the doctors, nor the court, have the right to inspect the sign manual of Almighty God bestowed upon Miss Craft in evidence of her purity; and no man not a parson, and conscious of his own guilt, would accept an acquittal, under circumstances which made that sort of infamy necessary, when he could avoid it by pleading guilty to the other counts in the indictment.

When a Freethinker comes to the end of life and lets go without expressing the hope of a further existence elsewhere, it pleases the religious person to say that the deceased has "died as the beast dieth." Apart from the fact that they are conscious of the approach of death and that they comment more or less philosophically upon that event, I suppose it may be admitted that all men die as beasts die, the processes of dissolution being substantially the same throughout the animal world. But that is not what the religious person means. His intimation is that all unbelievers are beasts. If he intended that his language should embody a statement of scientific fact or natural truth, he would repeat it, with terms changed to accord with the circumstances, when a new life is announced. For "begotten as the beast is begotten" or "born as the beast is born" is so indisputably true as to be a superfluous remark. Christians get here by the process common to mammals; and saying nothing about the paternity of Christ, it has not been asserted that his birth was out of the ordinary course of nature, though it might be urged that he was born in the manger of a beast. The orthodox innuendo, "Died as the beast dieth," expresses nothing but the malice of the brute who utters it.

Says the Rev. Samuel Jones: "Establish the fact that men can think as they please, and with that you establish the fact that they can act as they please." As Mr. Jones does not approve of free thinking it is to be inferred that he regards its result, free acting, as undesirable. We do not reach a true notion of what a jail of a thing religion is until we hit something like the forgoing quotation from the remarks of the Georgia evangelist. This man is unable to think of a human being as otherwise than a criminal. In his mind we are a set of savages whose hearts thirst for gore, burn with lust, and contract with covetousness. Left to himself each would murder his brother, slander his sister, and rob his own valise. That, we must conclude, is the kind of man Sam Jones is naturally, but having immured himself in this jail of belief he is restrained from following his depraved impulses. He can gaze between the bars of his prison, shake his club at the free citizen, cast lewd eyes upon the womenfolk, close his fist as though it contained the wealth of others which he covets, and roar about what he would do except for the chains that bind him. Being that sort of man, or deluding himself into the belief that he is, he cannot understand why everybody else should not seek the security offered by his jail. In his case superstition performs imperfectly the office of what in rational people is recognized as respect for the rights of others, founded in the knowledge that invasion would forfeit their own claim to freedom. But Mr. Jones has stated the Freethought position accurately, as I understand it. That every man shall do as he pleases is my notion of the best possible adjustment of human relations. If that state of affairs existed, there would be no offenses against person or property, for no one would please to serve as the victim. Theologians and moralists have bungled the scheme by saying that a man may do as he pleases so long as he pleases to do right; then they have assumed the burden of instructing him as to what is right, which consists in doing what they please rather than what he pleases. And there you have it in a nutshell.

The late Charles H. Reisser, of Philadelphia, had long entertained the wish that after death his body might be cremated. He so instructed his family, and the latter promised to respect his will in that regard. Mr. Reisser was a member of two Masonic lodges, which organizations declined to attend his funeral on the ground that cremation was not a "Christian" form of burial. In order to secure the attendance of the Masons, therefore, and presumably the death benefits, the family of the deceased were obliged to abandon their original intentions; the funeral was held with Masonic incantations and the body placed in a vault.

What constitutes Christian burial it is of course the privilege of Christians to decide, though from an exterior point of view it appears just as religious to be quickly consumed by heat as slowly devoured by worms. But whether it is or not, no one is likely to deny that disregard for the wishes of the dead and their near friends, especially if those wishes conflict with whiskered superstitions, is pious out of sight. In fact, it is so eminently Christian that although the Masons are the enemies of the Roman church—hereditary, excommunicate, and essentially damned—the Catholic Review can not refrain from applauding the recreant Philadelphia lodges. Jubeli, jubelo, jube hoc est corpus.

Letters of Friends.

How Is the Milwaukee League?

MILWAUKEE, WIS., April 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Cream City has its great share of churches, the Roman Catholic being the largest. The ministers continue to add variety to their work by giving a series of lectures to young women, or to young men, etc. The lectures to young women have a great tendency to make women contented with a mere aimless life and to discourage any advancement or ambition they may have. They are not in favor of girls following any calling for which they may be fitted. It has been frequently remarked to me that women who devote their time and attention to some particular pursuit do not have sufficient time to devote to their spiritual welfare.

Mr. R. G. Ingersoll delivered a lecture here some time ago on "The Bible." As I was engaged in teaching that evening I could not attend. However, it was considered a great success by the intelligent people who attended, and it was said that the argument was forcible and convincing.

I wish to inquire if there are any Liberal organizations in Milwaukee, as I have not been able to learn of any.

I would like to say to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that as I am a certificated teacher of the Benn Pitman system of phonography, I would like to give instruction by mail to a few who would like the study. A course of home instruction will be equal to that given in many of the business colleges. At present I am engaged in teaching the shorthand and writing department of the Milwaukee Business University. Should any one contemplate the study of phonography, I would be glad to give information as to what course of study it would be best to pursue.

Yours for reform,

With Western Improvements.

JOHN DAX, OR., March 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose herewith twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL, as I do not care to miss any of Mr. G. Macdonald's writings. His true Western style, mingled with his sarcasm, strikes us Western readers of your paper about right, and his "Observations" are missed very much whenever they don't appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We have been pestered during the winter with a specimen of a "true Western reformed revivalist, a fellow that, for unadulterated gall and cheek, would be hard to beat. The more intelligent ones of this community soon had him rated about right, as an ex-shepherd from Montana, who had "blown in" his summer wages and was bumming his way through the winter on the strength of his "gift of gab" and the softness of a few followers of the low and meekly Jesus. According to his own statements he must have been, what we term out west, "A hard old pill," and of the very material to make a No. 1 revivalist. He succeeded in making several converts, mostly children and old women, besides furnishing the boys a good butt for ridicule. I think that a healthy Liberal lecturer would meet with a hearty welcome in this region next summer, as Mrs. Krekel, Mr. Putnam, and others, having been through here during the last few years, have sown the seeds of Freethought which have borne good fruit.

I hope to be able to send you the names of a few new subscribers shortly. You may send a sample copy to each of the inclosed names. I also make it a point to do all the missionary work I can for the cause by loaning THE TRUTH SEEKER after reading it, and my "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which I received last fall, has not been home for over two months, which goes to show that Freethought literature is somewhat in demand out here.

Truly yours, CHAS. G. CASPARY.

An Apology.

GLENVILLE, O., April 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I owe Mr. Chas. O. Hays see THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 30th)

an apology. My article, "Truth About the Tariff" (issue of March 2d), was written with insufficient knowledge. For thirty years now I have studied the tariff question to the best of my ability, and supposed that I had made myself acquainted with the arguments urged in defense of the protective system. It was protectionism "as she is taught" that I had in mind, and I flattered myself that long and patient study had given me a fair knowledge of how she is taught. But by some mischance I was in utter ignorance of Mr. Hays's great work, in which he, no doubt, gives what I have ransacked large libraries to find—a solid, logical, irrefragable argument for protection, "whole as some serene creation minted in the golden moods of sovereign artists."

If he has done so (as I do not doubt), he has done what many men have labored in vain to do, and has made himself a name, and the fact that I am ignorant of his work is discreditable to me. Not to know him argues myself unknown. But if he has done so (as we must believe), he has done himself injustice in not getting his book properly before the world. For many years I have been on the watch for such a work, and am sure I should have known of it if it had been properly pushed. But Mr. Hays has done the world a greater wrong than himself. For the world needs the book more than Mr. Hays needs the honor and glory and wealth to be derived from it. If protection is to endure it must be defended by argument. It must appeal with convincing force to the reason and conscience of mankind. Its champions must show that the system is founded in truth and is consistent with the established principles of liberty and justice. Now the opinion widely prevails that no man of first-rate ability has ever undertaken to defend protection; that protectionism as a body of doctrine is to be ranked with such beliefs as witchcraft and Christianity. And if Mr. Hays has shown that this opinion is erroneous he has no right to hide so great a light under a bushel; to do so is to defraud his fellow-men.

I must say that personally I feel aggrieved at Mr. Hays's negligence, but have no malice in my nature. I war upon creeds and not upon men. While I denounce the Christian religion as unspeakably wicked and cruel as well as absurd, I would not hold the little finger of the most bigoted and incorrigible Christian in the flame of a lamp one minute. I shall find it easy to forgive Mr. Hays if he will at this late day kindly make accessible the knowledge heretofore concealed (from me at least) in his great but unknown book. And after I have done myself the honor of reading the book and being convinced of the error of free trade theories and the glorious beauty and truth of protectionism, I will do all in my power to spread the light of this new gospel that is to redeem mankind.

There have been great thinkers and great protectionists; but the great thinkers have not, I think, as a rule, been protectionists, nor the great protectionists, thinkers. By showing that at least one great protectionist is also a great thinker, Mr. Hays will vindicate his right to be enrolled among the benefactors of the race.

"On earth there's nothing great but man; In man there's nothing great but mind."

A. F. HAMILTON.

Local Editors a Queer Lot.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., March 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago Mr. Groh suggested utilizing the local press so far as possible in spreading Liberal principles. The suggestion is a very good one, but, generally speaking, you will find the editors of those papers narrow-minded, weak-kneed, backboneless. My experience with them is not very flattering. We circulated a petition in Salina against the Blair bill some years back, and a Rev. Mr. Chittenden attacked me personally in every paper in the town. There was only one of them that willingly allowed me to reply, and one other was persuaded to give me a hearing only when I took some of my friends up to the office and very kindly told the editor that if he did not give me a hearing in self-defense he could stop our papers. Not long since I wrote a short article for the Salina Union on free speech and a free press. In that article I was perfectly non-partisan, that is, attacked no class in particular, but did not get a hearing. In that article I said: "The Constitution guarantees the right of free speech and a free press, yet there are individuals and classes all over this broad land of ours that would nullify all these principles upon which our free government is founded, and the persons or class that make the attempt ought to be branded as traitors to this country." Now, the editor of that paper knew that the above was the truth, but he would not insert the communication. Just a week or two before offering this article I noticed among what purported to be "pert" sayings in the same paper, "Don't argue with the Infidel." Much logic in that saying! Some of these local editors say when we go to them, "Oh, we must be conservative," but are they? The other side can get into these papers the most bigoted, illogical, tyrannical things imaginable, without a murmur. The facts are, they are nothing but stool-pigeons for would-be tyrants. I never subscribed for a local paper until after I got to canvassing for books, and then only in a business way, for I had such a poor opinion of their course. But let us be charitable and keep trying them occasionally with a Liberal article, and, once in a while, write to the Liberal press and report just how well you have succeeded; nothing gets away with a person faster, who won't do justice, than to tell it publicly. Then another good plan would be to go to all the editors in a town and get them to agree to publish a series of articles on a given subject, one to appear in each paper of the town until all have been served with one. The editors would see at once that this would not give the bigot any chance to show his spite by giving his competitors the advantage, and would leave them absolutely free. Of course we desire to use the local paper only for something of a local nature [unless they comment on affairs of wider interest]. And another good plan would be to have the Liberal editor send the local editor a marked copy of the issue in which you criticize him.

Mr. Editor, I have some news items that ought to have gone to the local editor, but I feel a little discouraged about sending anything more to him at present. The baseball season has opened here. They will meet regularly every Sunday during the season, notwithstanding the Rev. Mr. Mucklow was overheard to say "that he had money to put up to say that there would be less baseball playing on Sunday this year than last." The New Cambria Literary Society adopted a rule this winter not to allow anything of a religious character to be discussed, yet these same Christians have the audacity to boast "of our free institutions and of our Christian civilization, and that our forefathers were all good Christians," notwithstanding our forefathers gave us a Constitution in favor of free speech and a free press, which their society would deny and eschew.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

But Mr. Bierck was Substantially Right.

COSCOB, CONN., April 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: One of those everlasting falsehoods that occasionally descend even upon the most sincere truth seeker, has crawled into Mr. Bierck's excellent address, printed in your issue of the 13th. It is a quotation from the alleged "blue laws of the dominion of New Haven," in the following words: "No one shall travel, cook victuals, make bread, sweep houses, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath day; no one shall cross a river on Sunday but an authorized clergyman; no one shall kiss his wife, her husband, or child on the Sabbath, or on fasting days. The Sabbath day shall commence at sunset on Saturday."

There are plenty of well-founded charges against the Puritans of New England; but these alleged blue laws never existed. They were forged by a lying scoundrel of an Episcopalian parson named Samuel Peters, rector of a little church in Hebron, Conn., who was run out of that town in 1774 for being a bitter Tory. He ran away to Boston and thence to England, where, in 1781, he published his "General History of Connecticut." Peters was a thoroughbred, congenital, constitutional, up-and-down liar; he was like Hudibras, —for profound

And solid lying, much renowned.

He called himself L.L.D., but he never had any degree of any kind, unless these initials may be taken to mean, Lies Like the Devil. His book is sticky with falsehoods. The luxuriant superfluity of his lying may be judged by the description in his book of Bellows Falls in the Connecticut river, where he says the water is so compressed between the rocky sides of the falls that "no iron crow can be forced into it," and "the stream is harder than marble."

If I had time, and you space, I would quote some more of the gambols in untruthfulness of this pious man. But my only object is to explain to you that he got up all these yarns of his about blue laws out of sheer hatred to the "rebels" of old Connecticut. The early laws of Connecticut, as well as those of Massachusetts, were, to some extent, harsh and unreasonable, but not so much so as those of some other colonies, or of England, as I could easily prove. Of course you are not to blame for Mr. Bierck's misstatement, and he was, doubtless, no more to blame than you. So this note is only to inform you in advance, in case Lying Sam Peters's forgeries should appear before you again, as they are pretty certain to do.

Very truly yours, PRIGGLES.

[We are aware of the verbal exaggerations contained in the writings of the Rev. Mr. Peters, as we presume Mr. Bierck was also, but the fact remains that the popular understanding of the New England "Blue Laws" is substantially correct, as we showed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 20 and 27, 1894, to which "Priggles" is referred for fuller particulars upon which our conclusion is based. We then quoted this from Alice Morse Earle's "Sabbath in Puritan New England." "Though these laws were worded by Dr. Peters, and though we are disgusted to hear them so often quoted as historical facts, still we must acknowledge that though in detail not correct, they are in spirit true records of the old Puritan laws which were enacted to enforce the strict and decorous observance of the Sabbath, and which were valid not only in Connecticut and Massachusetts, but in other New England states. Even a careless glance at the historical records of any old town or church will give plenty of details to prove this." For some of these details we refer "Priggles" to Miss Earle's work above mentioned, beginning at page 245, and to "A Critical History of Sunday Legislation," by Rev. A. H. Lewis, D.D., page 186 and following. Perhaps our Connecticut correspondent thinks that the assertion that a man could have been punished for kissing his wife on Sunday is particularly rich in the "luxuriant superfluity" of its lying, but nevertheless at least one man was punished for just that offense, although in Massachusetts instead of Connecticut. Miss Earle relates that Captain Kemble, of Boston, was in 1656 "set for two hours in the public stocks for his 'lewd and unseemly behavior,' which consisted in his kissing his wife 'publicly' upon the Sabbath day, upon the doorstep of his house, when he had just returned from a voyage and absence of three years." Several Connecticut statutes, enacted both before and after the union of New Haven with that colony, punished non-attendance at church on Sunday, while the code of 1773 punished by a fine of five shillings whoever was absent from his house on Sunday except in attendance at church or from "necessity." Whipping, twenty stripes or less, was the penalty for the non-payment of the fines provided for by this code. New Haven and Connecticut were united under one government in 1665. One of the laws of New Haven decreed death as the penalty for the violation of the Sabbath law of the colony, if it was proved that the culprit had engaged in work or recreation on Sunday "proudly, presumptuously, or with a high hand." From all of which it appears that Rev. Mr. Peters kept much nearer to the truth in his "yarns" about the New England "Blue Laws" than the average minister does in writing about heretics.—Ed. T. S.]

Seen by a Looker-on.

NEW YORK, April 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: On Tuesday evening, April 9, the New York Microscopical Society held in the Museum of Natural History, Central Park, its sixteenth annual exhibition, and through the courtesy of a member of a prominent committee, I was permitted to be present. This society, compared with such metropolitan social misadventures as "The Tough Club," the "Merry Growlers," the "High Rollers," the Society of Tammany, and the Union Theological Seminary, is of vast usefulness.

The entire building was brilliantly lighted and the spacious second floor was filled with tables and about 150 microscopes, and eager members of the society exhibited to their inquiring friends some of the marvels the microscope reveals. This masterful invention shows us that we live in the midst of an infinit world, and that a speck, uninteresting to the naked eye, beneath the microscope at once becomes a subject of wonder and often of beauty. A tadpole, ordinarily, is a repulsive, slimy looking thing, but when we see a colorless fluid, its blood, flakily - something like the links of a chain - coursing in circuitous routes through its tail, it makes us wonder if even the tadpole, in its relation to the earth and the universe, is not of as much importance as even man, who is reputed to be created in the image of God, and by self-decree is declared to be the masterpiece of all animal organisms.

The thousand-eyed one-eye of the house fly also makes our dull members shrink from comparison with that which enables its sprightly possessor to easily escape our slow attempts to capture it. So far as we know, our one point of superiority to our microscopical brethren, as well as the ponderous elephant, the fleet horse, the spry squirrel, etc., is our plotting, tricky brain.

These are but hints as to the revelations on exhibition. There were shown many crystals of metals and chemical compounds, with their beautiful colorings and regularity of forms. To exhibit a trout seven days old was the pleasure of one of the young scientists. The little fellow, about half an inch long to the unaided eye, beneath the glass was vigorously working its gills and twitching nervously, perhaps looking for a fly on a hook.

One exhibit, however, was unnecessary, as its kind is too much in evidence to require the assistance of a microscope. They are sure to be seen and admired wherever they appear, although microscopical science will have to make still further strides before they will be understood in all of their relations to the beautiful objects that charm the eye of man. This exhibit was the picture of a young woman, but here, unlike the trout and tadpole, nature was conventionalized. Climatic and Parisian influences and false modesty had drawn the curtain over this exhibit so that all there was to admire was a lovely face and the frills and puffers and laces from the Sixth-avenue dry-goods stores.

As was to be expected, there was a molecule there from the Manhattan Liberal Club coquetting with the microbes and crystals. The frequenters of the club do not need to be told that the one referred to is everybody's friend and the monarch of brains, Mr. T. B. Wakeman. An opportunity to examine microscopically cell life and learn new facts from which to draw conclusions concerning evolution was not to be missed by him. The managers of the exhibition were probably in a state of Agnosticism toward their distinguished visitor. To the writer, even a view of the segmenting eggs of most primitive backboneed animals did not possess such interest as did the studious patience and gentleness this scientific investigator displayed in his search after new or additional facts. Mr. Wakeman says, "Let us progress," believing the problem of the origin of animal life can be solved or the solution approached much nearer than we are now. I venture to say no person there looked through more glasses that night than he. There are probably clergymen who would teach the rising generation to look upon this man as a demon, because he, after years of scholarly research, says he can find not a particle of evidence in contemporary languages that such a person as Jesus Christ ever did live. To disagree: Nobody believes now that such a person as Uncle Sam or as John Bull lives or ever did live. Nevertheless, a thousand years hence, without the present facilities of the printing-press and the more general enlightened condition of the people, Uncle Sam and John Bull might be made to appear as actual persons of the present time.

During the evening there were two lectures; one on the construction and history of the microscope, and the other by Prof. Bickmore, the pictorian. His subject was "Recent Advances in Visual Instruction." He presented scenes along the Hudson, showing the lake wherein rises the Hudson river and the beginning of the river, apparently four to ten feet wide. Because the water in the lake is so pure it is called tears from the clouds. He suggested it would be wise to conduct this limitless supply of pure water to the cities along the Hudson. One wintry scene among forests in Maine was so natural and pretty to look upon that it caused the sturdy axmen to appear as if enjoying a winter pleasure resort. He says man has in all ages been leveling forests, but the bulge on the blade of the axe, to throw out the chip, is claimed to be a Yankee invention.

L. D. CRINE.

COCOANUT GROVE, FLA., April 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It might seem presumptuous for an obscure individual to criticize such a paper as Public Opinion; but having taken and carefully read it eight or nine years, and not finding it, as I thought, complying with its promises or statements regarding itself, was it amiss to write just once as I did and say so? The letter and what followed may be of sufficient interest to publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER:

PUBLIC OPINION COMPANY: Inclosed find $1. Credit this on my subscription, and please stop the paper when the time for which this dollar will pay expires, without further notice from me. My reason for stopping the paper may or may not be of interest, nevertheless I will give it to you. It is because you do not keep the promises you make to your subscribers.

You promise to give "all sides of every great question, and every shade of every faith." I have taken your paper, I believe, eight or nine years. In former years Public Opinion was fairer than it is now. It did once in a long while give the views of evolutionists, but even that has died out. The paper seems to have been captured by priests to publish their sophistries, and the real scientific view of religion is as rigidly excluded as if no such thing existed. I will try to make my meaning plain: The New York Observer, a religious paper, as quoted in Public Opinion, May 10th, two or three years ago, said: "Scientists are almost universally Agnostics." Admitted - well, this Agnostic view of religion, which is the almost universal scientific belief, you have never once given a fair hearing. I defy you to show that you have allowed the essential arguments of one of that faith to be copied into your paper in the last eight years. You have allowed bigots to garble their sayings and denounce them, but fairly quoted their arguments you have not. Are not scientists a respectable class of people? Why should they be denied a hearing and almost constantly denounced?

There is another mode of reasoning you exclude just as rigidly as the scientific view. There are zealous, earnest men who take the book upon which the priests rely, and show that it contradicts itself hundreds of times, and teaches many great immoralities, and is inconsistent with proven facts; yet you allow nothing of that to be quoted in Public Opinion.

There is still a milder view than the Agnostic's, which is excluded. This is represented by Professor Le Comte in his book - "Evolution as Related to Religious Thoughts" - showing that evolution proves that man came up, and disproves the fall through Adam, the corner-stone of the Christian religion.

When all these different faiths and modes of reasoning are rigidly excluded, what becomes of your statement every week that Public Opinion represents "all sides of every great question, and every shade of every faith?" I claim it can be shown and proven that you exclude from your paper all reasoning and argument that would show the true logic of the foundation principle of morality, as demonstrated by science and proven by facts; but you fill your columns about fifty-two times a year with the swashy sophistries of ministers and priests, trying to support their positions in their fight against science and common sense, and deny science and common sense a hearing, and then pose every week before the public as giving "all sides of every great question, and every shade of every faith."

In summing up, truth requires it to be said that you constantly conceal the logic of proven facts, and unceasingly publish the sophistries of superstition. Of course it is well known to you and unnecessary for me to say, that there are many able journals published every week that advocate the true logic of these scientific principles mentioned; but every word from them, and their very names, are as rigidly excluded as if the world did not contain them. I will mention the names of a few of these papers: THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York; Independent Pulpit, Waco, Tex.; Investigator, Boston, and many others.

Advice gratis is not usually valued, but without making any charge I would advise you to withdraw your promise, or try to comply with it. Very respectfully,

SAMUEL RHODES.

In reply I received this:

WASHINGTON, March 15, 1895.

SAMUEL RHODES, Cocoanut Grove, Fla.: Replying to your letter of Feb. 18th, we think that you have probably found some Liberal matter in the religious department in recent issues of Public Opinion. We would say that your letter did not reach the editorial rooms until after the matter for the religious department in our present issue was already in type.

Thanking you for writing us so frankly, we are, very truly, ERNEST E. RUSSELL, Editor Public Opinion.

I replied:

COCOANUT GROVE, FLA., March 30, 1895.

MR. ERNEST E. RUSSELL, Editor of Public Opinion: Thanks for courteous reply to my criticism of Public Opinion. Also for publishing quotations expressing Liberal sentiments in issue of March 21st, especially quotation from the Christian Register, with regard to blasphemy. If you ever come to Biscayne Bay I hope you will call and see me.

Very truly yours, SAMUEL RHODES.

What resulted? Mr. Russell took my advice, and withdrew the promise, as can be seen by consulting issues of March 14th and 21st.

In issue of March 21st appeared this from Christian Register, Unitarian, Boston: "Colonel Ingersoll's lectures, though they may offend good taste, are not any more blasphemous than a theology which made God a cruel devil and the majority of mankind the victims of his unrighteous hatred. For ministers who preach such doctrines to accuse Colonel Ingersoll of blasphemy is a parody on reverence."

This, I will venture to assert, is the most radical sentiment that ever appeared in Public Opinion. I think Liberals might unite in saying: "Small favors thankfully received, larger ones in proportion." In conclusion, I would ask, How can a respectable journal honestly or consistently pretend to represent intelligent public opinion while it taboos the logic and conclusions of the most eminent scientists, scholars, and philosophers the earth has ever produced, such as Humboldt, Haeckel, Huxley, Tyndall, and Buchner? - men whose logic and conclusions rest on proven facts alone.

SAMUEL RHODES.

Mortuary - J. L. Tompkins.

DES MOINES, IA., April 12, 1895.

J. L. Tompkins, the outspoken Liberal, of Lake City, Iowa, died April 1, 1895, aged 73 years and 2 days. He leaves a wife, one daughter, and three grandchildren to mourn his loss.

In the early part of his life, Mr. Tompkins leaned strongly toward Universalism, but never became a member of that or any other church. Paine's "Age of Reason" caused him to doubt, and later on THE TRUTH SEEKER cleared away the mists; he has taken it regularly for a period of about eighteen years. The Independent Pulpit was a favorite of his, as was also the Free-thought Magazine.

Mr. Tompkins was highly esteemed in the community where he resided. He was a kind-hearted and moral man, honest in all business transactions and prompt to meet his obligations.

The funeral services were held at the residence, and suffice it to say, no preacher was present. All preparations had been previously made by himself, and his directions were fulfilled to the letter. Three years prior to his death he selected an article from THE TRUTH SEEKER to be read at his funeral, also a poem from a Liberal work. These pieces, together with appropriate music on the piano, constituted the entire services.

Mr. Tompkins believed in neither gods, devils, heaven nor hell. He was not without faults, yet generosity, kindness, and integrity were prominent among his characteristics; and withal he possessed the courage to defend his principles.

He died as he lived, a Liberal thinker. He was conscious to the very last, and a few hours before his death he said substantially, "Tell Mr. F - [a Christian with whom he had previously conversed] that I have no fear of death. I do not wish to live any longer, and as for the future I'm not concerned whether I live hereafter or not."

WILLIAM W. WEST.

FOREST GROVE, OR., April 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received a telegram on the 28th of March to go to Scappoose and take charge of the funeral exercises of our well known and much respected friend and brother, Wm. W. West, who departed this life March 27th, aged 66 years 1 month and 23 days.

He was a man of marked character and sterling merit. He was strong in his convictions of justice and truth, and was brave enough to stand by his convictions. He was well known as a Freethinker, and in the last conversation of any length that he engaged in he said: "Tell the world that I die as I lived, a Freethinker." It was believed that he would recant at last, but this saying forever settled that question. His brother said, in a conversation after the funeral: "William and I differed in our beliefs and I hoped he would become a Christian when he knew he was to die. Do you know if he expressed himself in the premises?" I told him what William had said. He quietly walked into the depot and sat down, and was very reticent all the way to Portland. I felt very sorry for him. His belief was that his brother was lost. This, brought out in contrast with our philosophy that a good man in this life is a good man everywhere, and in every place that he may occupy will still continue to be good and cannot be lost, should encourage the faltering ones of our belief, and open their eyes to the light of this truth. Mr. West was an advocate of all practical reforms. He was in favor of temperance in all things; he was very liberal with his means toward building up industries and institutions to benefit mankind, and his hand was ever stretched forth in assistance. He was a good, kind husband and father and gave all his children a good education. His youngest son was at college at Monmouth at the time of Mr. West's death.

Secularism in Oregon has lost a staunch friend and a willing helper, but his magnificent wife is still left to carry out his wishes. She was constantly over him till the last. She is a noble woman, and her children are devoted to her and will prove a strong support for her in her loneliness.

On my return from the funeral I stopped at Portland to see Miss Olds. I found her quite ill with la grippe. I remained with her, lending what assistance I could, until Monday, when I started for home, and was seized on the train by the same disease and was confined to my bed until Friday. Saturday I went to McMinnville; Sunday I delivered my morning lecture and took charge of the Secular Sunday-school, but was unable to fill my evening appointment. I am better, however, and hope to again be at work strong as ever.

As I sent in the report of the Paine anniversaries, I should report my year's work in Forest Grove, which ended March 3d. I organized the Forest Grove and McMinnville circuits with a flourishing church at both places, also Secular Sunday-schools, both doing nicely. The average daily attendance at the Forest Grove Secular Sunday-school was 38. Besides the Sunday-school we had until adjournment a flourishing ethical society with fifty members. I delivered 62 addresses during the year, took charge of all programs, including choir practice and juvenile training, and my children are a marvel.

I am now preparing for a musicale and festival, about May 3d, of which you will receive a full report.

Respectfully, MRS. A. E. BARKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

If I Were You.

If I were you and had a friend
Who called, a pleasant hour to spend,
I'd be polite enough to say:
"Ned, you may choose what games we'll play."
That's what I'd do
If I were you.

If I were you and went to school,
I'd never break the smallest rule;
And it should be my teacher's joy
To say she had no better boy.
And 'twould be true
If I were you.

If I were you I'd always tell
The truth, no matter what befell;
For two things only I despise:
A coward heart and telling lies.
And you would, too,
If I were you.

If I were you I'd try my best
To do the things I here suggest.
Though since I am no one but me
I cannot very well, you see,
Know what I'd do
If I were you.

Auntie Bright's Lectures.

I.—CAUSE AND EFFECT.

"Logic is the science of reasoning," asserted Miss Madge.

"And wisdom the art of applying it, O Minerva," retorted her brother, Walter.

Auntie Bright smiled benignly upon the vigorous young logicians, her niece and nephew, who were visiting with her that summer.

"Then the old parable of Sir Isaac Newton and the falling apple you would call inductive reasoning, would you, Walter?" she asked.

"Oh," cried her nephew, enthusiastically, "that old philosopher revolutionized heaven and earth by his famous experiment; as Professor Grant said once, 'The infinit space of Nature and glorious revolving satellites yielded forth their secrets and all the earth's mysteries thereof.' But, auntie, what do you mean by inductive reasoning?"

"The science of cause and effect," she answered. "Inductive logic was originally ascribed to Lord Francis Bacon, but afterwards rightly credited to Roger Bacon, Galileo, Confucius, and others. Like his grandson, Roger Bacon had a low opinion of Aristotle and his ancient theories. 'If I could,' he said, 'I would burn all the books of Aristotle, for we lose our time in studying them, and they only serve to propagate error and ignorance.' These historical utterances caused him much sorrow and persecution. His life was as miserably valuable as that of Galileo, and he felt just as scornfully bitter. He said on his death-bed, while past events and degrading experiences passed in review before him: 'I am sorry to have given myself so much trouble in behalf of science.' But despite his dissatisfaction, he handed down to succeeding generations a rich tribute from a great mind.

"And now I will tell you a little legend illustrative of inductive reasoning, showing curiously facts deduced from close observation.

"One of the most popular household tales of Turkey relates how a rich citizen dying makes a strange will for his four sons, giving all his possessions that were white to the first, and his possessions that were black to another, all that were red to the third, and his brown slaves to the last.

"When I am gone," said the old man, after making this remarkable will, 'i there should any difficulty arise between you, go to the Ameer Hatti Bahran, make known the same to him and he will decide between you, for he is one of the wisest judges that ever sat at the gate.'

"Not long after the old man's death, a dispute arose among the brothers concerning the will. One would suppose it would be an easy matter to decide between white, black, red, or brown, but avarice put strange shades on plain colors, and the dispute waxed so warm that the four sons were obliged to make a journey to the ameer, according to the provisions of the will. Now the ameer or emir is prince or governor of an Arabian province. On their way the brothers passed through a meadow where a camel had been grazing, but which had now passed from sight.

"That was a one-eyed camel," said Mirzir.

"It was laden with honey," said Ayaz.

"It was also ridden by a woman."

"It was a stray camel," said Anmaz.

"Is was a crooked-breasted camel," said Rebiah.

Origin of Tea.

In Japan and China every one drinks tea, day and night, almost every hour. From China tea was introduced into Japan by the Buddhists as early as the ninth century, though it was not much cultivated until near the close of the twelfth century. Daruma, an Indian saint of the sixth century, often represented in Japanese art, either crossing the ocean on a reed, or sitting, a monument of patience, with his hands in his sleeves, was the father of the tea-plant. After years of sleepless watching and prayer, he suddenly became drowsy. At last his eyelids closed and he peacefully slept. When he awoke he was so ashamed of this pardonable weakness that he cut off the offending eyelids and threw them on the ground, where they instantly took root and sprouted into the shrub which has ever since had power to keep the world awake.

We have been requested to notice in our columns that a great Woman's Suffrage mass convention is to be held in Los Angeles, Cal., commencing April 26th. The meetings will be held at the Old Chamber of Commerce, 137 S. Main street, and will be interesting, for the women of California understand how to make meetings lively and attractive. All THE TRUTH SEEKER readers will be there, some to participate, and others to wish the cause good speed. The editor of the Corner sends greetings and good wishes to her sisters across the continent.

Correspondence.

KREBS, I. T., April 9, 1895.

MISS WIXON: I have promised you that I would write again when I saw my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I had my sister to fill my promise. Now I will write you a few lines and tell you what the preachers are doing here. They are all beginning to fix up the churches; the Sunday-school teacher wanted my sister and me to go again, but we don't do that kind of business. We are going to have Mr. J. E. Remsburg lecture here for one week, about the middle of May.

Miss Wixon, papa would like to know if you ever came to this part of the country, if so, we would like to have you come here and lecture. Please answer this letter through the Children's Corner. I remain, Yours in truth,

HANNER BECKER.

[Should we ever go anywhere near Krebs, we will be sure to find the Beckers and we will have a lovely time together, and a lecture also.—ED. C. C.]

NEWTON, MONT., March, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I thought I would write again, since my other letter escaped the waste basket. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER a good many years and I like to read the Children's Corner very much. I have two brothers and one sister; they are all quite large. We go to school every day and like our teacher; her name is Mrs. Maud Widmyer. They are talking of having two months' more of school, but I couldn't go because I have to help in the house. My father and mother are both living; my mother is thirty-five years old and my father is forty-nine years. My father, brother, sister, and myself play for most by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free. F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

all of the dances around here. We have an organ, a violin, a horn, bass viol, and mandolin. We have quite a band. The place we live in is called Newlon; it isn't thickly settled. We have a farm containing 320 acres. My father is going to have ninety acres of oats this year, and six or eight acres of potatoes. We are trying to sell our farm, but there isn't anyone around here that wants it. It is the nicest place in this vicinity—a creek runs right below our house, and in the summer my sister and I carry water from it to water the garden. I am fourteen years old. I would like to correspond with some of the boys and girls. From your Liberal friend,

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. S. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. "The Better World."

Dr. E. B. Southwick shows what he thinks the world should be in a book entitled, "The Better World." In the preface the author tells about going to the bedside of a man said to be dying. He told the bed-ridden person that he was not ill and to get up. The person did so. In the world pictured by Dr. Southwick there is no illness because all the people have to do to be well is to say they are not ill. No one is possessed of any of the baser passions, and there are no lawyers, doctors, or ministers. This is a pleasant picture, but an impossible one. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. Price 50 cents.—Chicago Times.

A Theory of Progress.

"Pleasure and Progress" by Albert M. Lorentz (The Truth Seeker Company, paper, 50c), is a bold and carefully thought out theory of the source and method of attaining all human progress. It is stated on the title page to be "an attempt to prove that the pursuit of pleasure in the sine qua non of intellectual, moral, and social development, and that the promotion of pleasure is the duty of philanthropy and statesmanship." But it is not to be understood that the word pleasure is to be confined to the narrow meaning usually attached to it. The broad contention is that if the attainment of progress in any direction did not contribute pleasurable sensation in any way, or were merely negatively unattended by pain, there would never be any progress in that direction. Pleasures are divided into material, ideal, and social, and there is ingenious and often convincing argument to show that every step in human progress has been made because it in some way contributed to one or more of these. The pleasure of the savage, the barbarian, and the civilized man are traced with acumen, and there is an elaborate argument to prove that all religions are traceable backward to fear of and reverence for chiefs, kings and fancied ghosts. Here is where the theory will encounter the sharpest criticism, and even to one not disposed to combat it on this particular score, this part of it does not seem to be necessary. The theory may be sound otherwise without it. The author defines the purpose of life to be enjoyment, and of this industry is the prime condition. "Justice dictates that a man should earn all he enjoys and enjoy all he earns." And from this he works out through three accurately systematized and elaborately argued divisions intellectual, moral, and social development. Individual liberty, with the necessary responsibility for all the good and bad consequences of acts, the author holds to be the condition of all progress, and he asserts without fear of contradiction that in every case where civilization has stagnated it has been because of denial or restriction of the sovereignty of the individual over himself. In the course of his argument he attacks much in present conditions. He is, for example, an out-and-out Freetrader, and he bases his belief in this regard in the very elementary constitution of men and things. He deprecates restriction on divorce, holding that nobody will ask for divorce who can be happy together, and that if they cannot be happy together they should not be compelled to live together; that so to compel them breeds far worse immorality than would entire freedom of separation, and that this latter, with proper care for the welfare of children, would breed no evils except such as would be merely transitory.

Sometimes he is in error as to facts. Thus, he takes pride in saying that the United States has never been disgraced by the horrible barbarities of the religious fanatics called flagellants, who, he says, are found in Mexico. The fact is that there are none at all in Mexico, and that the only flagellants for many years have been in parts of this country. But he does not often err in his facts. He sharply attacks, also, modern methods of education, and in this he is most abundantly borne out by facts, and his arraignment is practically unanswerable.

His book is altogether a curious and suggestive one, to which much more space could be given. But this meager outline must suffice. His style is far from polished, but it is crisp, epigrammatic, and earnest. His sentences are all short, and there is rarely any occasion to hesitate over his meaning.—Chicago Times.

"A Tale of a Halo."

Morgan A. Robertson lives in New York. He is an Oswego boy—a son of Captain "Andy" Robertson, of the First ward, one of the old-time lake navigators. "Morg," as the young man was familiarly known among the boys of his acquaintance, was unusually bright and a genius in his way. He had his father's love for the sea, and after going through Oswego's graded schools, he sailed upon the lakes and finally went around the world. After a series of interesting experiences he returned home and became a diamond cutter. His spare moments were spent in improving his mind, and lately he has turned his attention to literary work, with the result that one of the holiday gems found upon the shelves of our bookstores is from his pen. Mr. Robertson has heretofore shown marked literary talent, but the first effort of his to reach the Oswego public is "A Tale of a Halo," with illustrations by A. Carey K. Jurist, and published by the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York.

The story relates in rhyme the experiences of St. Peter as gatekeeper of heaven. One applicant forced his way in and is critical as to his appearance in the celestial garb, insisting especially on a halo which shall be more gorgeous than any hitherto seen there. This causes a commotion at once among the other inhabitants—the very thing desired, for it transpires that the newcomer is Beelzebub, sent up by Satan for the very purpose of breaking up the community. His real character is discovered, but the host of heaven is powerless against him, and there is slaughter and encounters innumerable until the sign of the cross is made. Then the infernal visitor wilts. But his escape has shaken up the self-satisfied dwellers in the upper region and they find they can't even sing well together. A complete reorganization is effected, and while peace is not complete there is greater activity and watchfulness.

The poem, which is written in a grotesquely humorous vein, and superficially at least is irreverent, may be intended as an expression of the prevalent criticism of the inactivity of the church in its relation to the world, the flesh, and the devil; a position which the church does not admit, but a criticism which is urged nevertheless.—Oswego Palladium.

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Not for Parsons.

NURSE: "Bertie, you naughty boy, leave off playing with your soldiers directly! Haven't I told you that you mustn't play with them on Sunday?" Bertie: "Yes, nurse, but this is a religious war."—Judy.

His pastor (reprovingly): "I understand you have been playing cards for money, Mr. Easy-mark." Easy-mark (indignantly): "For money? It's false. I haven't won a cent in two months."—Buffalo Courier.

MRS. POORMAN: "It has been a hard winter, ma'am. My three grown girls have been very little help to me. The poor things are not strong enough to do washing, and they haven't clothes good enough to apply for any other work." District Visitor: "But you say they have rich relatives; don't they look after them?" Mrs. Poorman (sadly): "Only their morals, ma'am—only their morals!"—Puck.

LITTLE JACK prays every night for all the different members of his family. His father had been away at one time for a short journey, and that night Jack was praying for him as usual. "Bless papa and take care of him," he was beginning as usual, when suddenly he raised his head and listened. "Never mind about it now, Lord," ended the little fellow; "I hear him down in the hall."—New York Tribune.

THE latest fad in Mississippi, according to an exchange, is the organization of hugging societies, for the purpose of swelling church treasuries, prices ranging according to quality. Here is the scale: For girls from 15 to 20 years, 50 cents; from 20 to 24, 75 cents; widows (depends on looks), from 10 cents to $3; old maids and school marmas, one hug for a nickel. Preachers are not charged, and editors take it out in advertising.

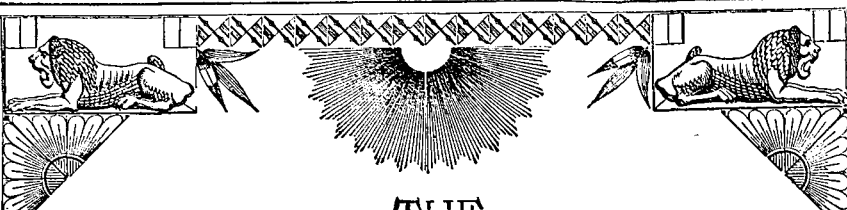

AN exchange tells of a parson who had had a call from a little country parish to a large and wealthy one in a big city. He asked time for prayer and consideration. He did not feel sure of his light. A month passed. Finally, some one met his youngest son in the street. "How is it, Josiah," said his neighbor, "is your father going to B—?" "Well," answered the youngster, judiciously, "paw it still prayin' for light, but most of the things is packed."

AN old negro minister in the village recently got off a very good joke unintentionally. He was preaching from the text that "the Lord Jesus Christ walked abroad, curing divers diseases," and in the course of his sermon he said: "Yes, brethren and sisters, you git sick and you send for Dr. Whitehead or Dr. Wilson and they can cure 'most any disease that flesh is heir to, but when it comes to these here divers, 'tain't nobody but God a'mighty hisself kin cure 'em."

THEY do say that there is a student now in college who is very fond of betting and never loses an opportunity to place a bet. He has been attending the Pearson meetings and became very much enthused over them, but he hasn't lost the taste for his favorite sport, as the following conversation shows: "Dr. C., if I get religious and die will I go to heaven?" Dr. C.: "Of course." "Will I have wings there?" "Certainly." "Will you be there, too?" "Yes, I hope so." "And will you have wings, too?" "Yes." "Then, by George, I'll bet you ten dollars that I'll beat you flying."

"Oh, yes," observed W. S. Cleveland, the minstrel manager, in answer to a query, "I do find a good many queer characters engaged in local management. I recall one case, and he was a case. I was at the time making a feature of a party of Arabs with my troupe and had applied for a date. To my astonishment he declined to negotiate, replying, 'I hear that you have got a lot of Arabs who are Mohammedans with your show, and I cannot play them in my theater, as I am a Presbyterian.' I immediately wired him, 'Arabs have all been converted,' to which he promptly responded, 'All right; will hold the date.' After that there was no difficulty in fixing dates and terms."—New York World.

A WELL-KNOWN manufacturer went into a Middle street hat store for a new silk hat yesterday. He is tall, lank, and cadaverous, and wears black clothes and a lawn tie. He found a hat that pleased him, and asked the price of it. The clerk said confidentially: "The price of that hat is $8, but we make a discount of $6 to clergymen." The manufacturer promptly paid for it, and then the clerk said: "I hope that hat will please the members of your congregation as well as yourself. We should be glad of their trade." Here the manufacturer gave the clerk to understand that it made very little difference to him what the "congregation" thought, and put the statement in such strong language that the clerk has been wondering ever since what denomination the "clergyman" represents.

PIANOS! PIANOS

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Inger- soll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Travels in Faith.

By CAPT. ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Being the story of his mental journey from orthodoxy to Rationalism.

Gems of Thought.

CHARACTER is built like a house; each action rests on a foregone one which made it possible, although the foregone one be buried in the earth and forgotten.—Unity.

WRITE it on your heart that every day is the best day in the year. No man has learned anything rightly until he knows that every day is doomsday.—R. W. Emerson.

FORTUNATELY for us, there have been traitors and there have been heretics, blasphemers, thinkers, investigators, lovers of liberty, men of genius, who have given their lives to better the condition of their fellow-men.—Ingersoll.

To urge that our own country should strive with all its might to be better, higher, purer, nobler, more generous than other countries—the only kind of patriotism worth a moment's thought in a righteous man's eyes—is accounted by most men both wicked and foolish.—Grant Allen.

EACH member of a race fulfilling the conditions to a greater happiness, must be so constituted that he may obtain full satisfaction for every desire without diminishing the power of others to obtain like satisfaction—may, must derive pleasure from seeing pleasure in others.—Herbert Spencer.

LET us all seek truths as if none of us had possession of it. The opinions which to this day have governed the earth, produced by chance, disseminated in obscurity, admitted without discussion, credited from a love of novelty and imitation, have, in a manner, clandestinely usurped their empire.—Volney.

CHILDHOOD and old age have much in common. There is the illimitable outlook; theirs the infinitely receding horizon. Standing aside from the strenuous, enthralling struggle, when in the noonday glare men and women are jostling and trampling each other in the thoroughfare of life, they gaze dreamily into a far beyond—future or past.—Mathilde Blind.

A FRUITFUL source of bad political action is the existence in the minds of most people, consciously or unconsciously, of two standards of morality, one governing their private actions and another their public relations. Many, if not most men, will vote to have the government do acts which they would scorn to be guilty of in their private capacity.—E. D. Burleigh.

STATESMEN no more the tinker's way, Mended and patched from day to day, Content with piecing part with part, But took the mighty problem whole, Beginning with the human heart— For noble rulers make in vain Unselfish laws for selfish men, And give the whole wide world its vote, But who is going to give it soul? —Richard Le Gallienne.

THE Hoboken preachers who endeavored to prevent Ingersoll from lecturing in their village served only to defeat the object they wished to effect. All interferences with free speech are like failures. Thought is dangerous to invested error. It is not to be restrained by interdictions put upon speech. Somehow, though its oracle were gagged, and bound hand and foot, and left in the dust for dead, his thought would ascend triumphantly above the parsimony of physical disaster and make its way to the conscience of the race.—Horace L. Traubel.

DESPITE the countless difficulties created by nature itself, man has evolved from barbarism to the moral eminence which enables him to desire still greater possibilities beyond. And so he may gain confidence in the thought that, by giving his life a moral purpose, he acts in harmony with the evolution of goodness. If nature be at war with nature, he can ally himself with the tendency which makes for righteousness. Thus, the moral hero, moved by a passion which may not unfitly be called the Euthusiasm of Development, can dare to face a gainsaying world, and take up the cross of unpopularity.—F. J. Gould.

A MAN publishes and sells a certain book. Somebody dislikes the sentiments of that book, and believes that the perusal of such sentiments would corrupt the community. He asks the judge to restrain his neighbor from circulating that book. The judge calls about him a jury, and asks them if they think the book will tend to deprave public morals. They say, Yes. Then the judge orders the book to be suppressed, and the seller of it to be punished. From first to last, the whole procedure is speculative. It is not shown that any injury has been done; it is not shown, or even suggested, that any evil was intended; it is a decision based upon the powers of imagination, at best; more correctly, perhaps, upon capacities for panic.—Moncure D. Conway.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clasp-trap, but only in wisdom—the science of health. Wise men study nature, learn disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. THROUGH the death of Mr. Scott the Chicago Times-Herald has ceased to be a Democratic and has become a high protectionist Republican organ. The silver Senators were negotiating with the editor to secure the paper for the new party, but H. H. Kohlsaat got ahead of them. A new Democratic paper, the Inquirer, has been incorporated with a capital of $1,000,000.

THE terms of the treaty of peace between China and Japan open Peking and five other ports of China to the trade of the world, and also much of the interior of China, and permit the establishment of cotton factories and other industries. No conquering Christian power has been known to grant such generous opportunities to other peoples. Japan secures the Liao Tung peninsula to the fortieth degree of latitude, the Island of Formosa, and an indemnity of 200,000,000 taels (the tael is about 71 cents).

ABOUT April 15 there were severe floods in the Connecticut, the Merrimac, the Pemigewasset, and other New England rivers. Many railroad and other bridges were swept away and other property destroyed. Four steamers were sunk at Lowell; six thousand shoemakers were thrown out of employment at Haverhill, and six thousand paper men by the bursting of the dam of the S. D. Warren Paper Co. on the Presumpscot River in Maine. These are types of the disasters brought by the heavy rains falling on lands denuded of forest growth.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well-known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

THE ONLY SAFE PLACE FOR OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam on April 24th started on a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

Ravings of a Pulpit Mountebank.

Of course it is a waste of time and energy to attempt to argue with T. DeWitt Talmage. You may argue at him, but not with him, for the use of the latter preposition necessarily implies that two are engaged in the argument, and all the world knows that the erstwhile performer at the Brooklyn Tabernacle is an acrobat and pyrotechnist instead of an investigator and logician. Yet such is the peculiar mental state of multitudes in this city that every Sunday afternoon Talmage talks to great crowds in the Academy of Music on Fourteenth street. Here are some samples of his profoundly instructive discourse of Sunday, April 21st:

"While men are in robust health, and their digestion is good, and their nerves strong, they think their physical strength will get them safely through the last exigency. They say it is only cowardly women who are afraid at the last, and cry out for God. 'Wait till I come to die. I will show you. You won't hear me pray, nor call for a minister, nor want a chapter read me from the Bible.' But after the man has been three weeks in a sickroom his nerves are not so steady, and his worldly companions are not anywhere near to cheer him up, and he is persuaded that he must quit life; his physical courage is all gone.

"He jumps at the fall of a teaspoon in a saucer. He shivers at the idea of going away. He says, 'Wife, I don't think my infidelity is going to take me through. For God's sake don't bring up the children to do as I have done. If you feel like it, I wish you would read a verse or two out of Fannie's Sabbath-school hymn book or New Testament.' But Satan breaks in and says: 'You have always thought religion trash and a lie; don't give up at the last. Besides that, you cannot, in the hour you have to live, get off on that track. Die as you lived. With my great black wings I shut out that light. Die in darkness. I send away from you that last vestige of hope. It is my business to strip the slain.'"

Will Mr. Talmage please give us the name and place of residence while living of some "Infidel" who acted as he says this hypothetical individual did? However, what is the use of asking for the verification of such a statement? We all know that the yarn is simply a piece of Talmagian fireworks; the introduction of "Satan" proves that. But suppose that in now and then an instance a man who was a doubter while in the possession of his mental and physical strength does "repent" at the approach of death, when his nervous system is unstrung by pain and his vitality reduced by wasting disease—what of it? What does it prove that could advantage the church? Why should the Christian be proud of victories won over men whose bodies and brains are sick, when the mind naturally dallies with the fancies of childhood? Is the church so weak that she can triumph only over the helpless and dying?

"A man who had rejected Christianity and thought it all trash, came to die. He was in the sweat of a great agony, and his wife said: 'We had better have some prayer.' 'Mary, not a breath of that,' he said. 'The lightest word of prayer would roll back on me like rocks on a drowning man. I have come to the hour of test. I had a chance, but I forfeited it. I believed in a liar, and he has left me in the lurch. Mary, bring me Tom Paine, that book that I swore by and lived by, and pitch it into the fire, and let it burn and burn as I myself shall soon burn.' And then, with the foam on his lip and his hands tossing wildly in the air, he cried out: 'Blackness of darkness! Oh, my God, too late!' And the spirits of darkness whistled up from the depths, and wheeled around and around him, stripping the slain."

And newspaper syndicates print that stuff in patent insides and make plate matter of it, and it goes out all over the country and into the hands of millions of readers, and then people wonder that Max Nordau can think that we are a race of degenerates! What else can men and women be but degenerate and imbecil if they read and believe such trash as that? Who that loves justice and covets truth would be willing to refer any question of vital interest to himself or the country to the suffrage of persons fed on such musty and stringy food as Talmage's sermons? Think of the wild absurdity of a man who had lived in accordance with the principles of liberty and equity enunciated by Thomas Paine fearing the agonies of an eternal hell because he had done so, and imagine, if you can, the vileness of a god who would damn him for so ordering his life. If Talmage believes that his god would commit so monstrous a crime, what must be thought of the intellectual ability and moral development of Talmage, for each man's god is the reflection of himself?

In God-fearing Arkansas.

One of THE TRUTH SEEKER's subscribers at Ft. Smith, Arkansas, has fallen into the hands of the Christians, and they are doing all they can to despoil and ruin him. Mr. D. C. Huddleston is a barber and he has been guilty of the "un American" crime of shaving in his own shop on Sunday those of his fellow citizens who desired that service on the first day of the week. Probably he ought to be drawn and quartered for this offense, and we have no doubt that there are any number of enthusiastic Christians in his state who would gladly show their "love" for their "enemies" by killing him in that way if the "law" only gave them the requisite permission and protection. Mr. Huddleston has been twice arrested and fined for attending to his own business on the ministers' day, the fines and costs amounting to $13.75. But this is only one phase of the medieval proceedings against our friend. He was serving as a juror in the United States court. The Methodists began a crusade against him on the ground of his infidelity, claiming that his unorthodox opinions disqualified him for that position. But the judge—Parker—was a man of sense, and he ruled that the court did not sit to pass judgment on any man's religion or want of religion. Then the chagrined but still vindictive followers of Wesley turned their attention to the circuit court of Arkansas and renewed there their attacks upon Mr. Huddleston, who was a juror in that court also. Here they succeeded, the judge holding that under the law of the state the Freethinker could not be a juror. Think of that!

Arkansas certainly needs to hold a constitutional convention and revise her organic law, for as it now stands it is a jumble of irreconcilable contradictions. Article II., Section 18 (Bill of Rights) reads:

"The General Assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or class of citizens, privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not equally belong to all citizens."

This is sweepingly inclusive and under it the rights of the Freethinker would be absolutely secure had not the Constitution, in a subsequent section, been made to do the very thing which it was forbidden to the legislature to do. What this was will appear further along. Section 24 says:

"All men have a natural and inalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent. No human authority can, in any case or manner whatsoever, control or interfere with the right of conscience; and no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious establishment, denomination, or mode of worship above any other."

If men have the right to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, it follows by a parity of reasoning that they have also the right not to worship, for it is self-evident that there is no freedom in worship when a penalty attends the failure or refusal to worship. A man does not freely follow the directions of his own conscience when he has no choice in the matter. So it appears that this section also of the Bill of Rights protects the equal citizen rights of Mr. Huddleston. Again: While the letter of the fundamental law of Arkansas says that no preference shall be given to any establishment, denomination, or mode of worship, it is clear that the spirit of the law would therefore be against the giving of any preference to the individuals who compose an establishment or denomination, or adhere to a particular mode of worship. Once more, then, the rights of the Freethinker are safeguarded. Section 25 of the Bill of Rights follows:

"Religion, morality, and knowledge being essential to good government, the general assembly shall enact suitable laws to protect every religious denomination in the peaceable enjoyment of its own mode of public worship."

Here is a rank discrimination against those who do not accept a religious belief as essential to good government and good citizenship, and the declaration is one that no constitutional convention nor any legislature has a right to make, for it amounts to a union of church and state in intention. It is not necessary that the legislature pass laws for the protection of the mode of worship of any denomination, for if the provisions of the Constitution, already quoted, are respected, the rights of no denomination will be infringed. As a matter of fact, so far as the Adventists are concerned, the legislature of the state has passed laws which inevitably interfere with the mode of worship of that sect, thus acting directly contrary to the edict of the Constitution.

Now we come to a section of the Bill of Rights that is undoubtedly inhibitive of any discrimination against any person on account of his lack of faith in the dogmas of any religion. Section 26 is as follows:

"No religious test shall ever be required of any person as a qualification to vote or hold office; nor shall any person be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his religious belief; but nothing herein shall be construed to dispense with oaths or affirmations."

There is nothing in the last sentence which invalidates the other two, for it distinctly provides for affirmation for the person who objects to taking an oath. Then, in all the Bill of Rights there is no ban declared in terms against the Atheist; he is not to be discriminated against, while Section 26 distinctly declares that no religious test shall be required of him if he wishes to vote or to hold office, and his right to testify as a witness is fully guaranteed. This being all indisputable, how does it come that a judge of one of the circuit courts of Arkansas renders a decision that the Freethinker, D. C. Huddleston, is debarred by the laws of the state from acting as a juror because he is a Freethinker? The answer is found in Section 1, Article XIX. of the "Miscellaneous Provisions" of the constitution:

"No person who denies the being of a God shall hold any office in the civil departments of this state, nor be competent to testify as a witness in any court."

Could contradiction be more startling and complete? Let us arrange these diametrically opposing provisions in this way:

Section 26 of the Bill of Rights: "No RELIGIOUS TEST SHALL EVER BE REQUIRED OF ANY PERSON AS A QUALIFICATION TO VOTE OR HOLD OFFICE."

Section 1 of Miscellaneous Provisions: "No person who denies the being of a God shall hold any office in the civil departments of this state."

Section 26 of the Bill of Rights: "No PERSON SHALL BE RENDERED INCOMPETENT TO BE A WITNESS ON ACCOUNT OF HIS RELIGIOUS BELIEF."

Section 1 of Miscellaneous Provisions: "Nor [shall any one who denies the being of a God] be competent to testify as a witness in any court."

How little the men who drafted the constitution of Arkansas knew about law, saying nothing of justice, is well shown by Section 29 of the Bill of Rights:

"This enumeration of rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people; and to guard against any encroachments on the rights herein retained, or any transgression of the higher powers herein delegated, we declare that everything in this article is excepted out of the general powers of the government, and shall forever remain inviolate; and that all laws contrary thereto, or to other provisions herein contained, shall be void."

But how can Section 26 remain forever inviolate if Section 1 of Article XIX. is enforced? Here is an absolutely impossible requirement made obligatory on all future legislators of the state. If laws are made to harmonize with Section 26 they must be void tested by Section 1, and if they are made to harmonize with Section 1 then they will be void tested by Section 26. A dilemma, truly.

Until Section 1 is amended out of existence by a constitutional convention, it will depend entirely upon the personal feeling of the judge whether an Atheist in Arkansas is permitted to sit on a jury or to testify in a court. But we think that the best lawyers will decide that the general guarantee of the Bill of Rights is paramount to the particular negation of Section 1. In fact, we do not see how a really competent jurist can hold otherwise. As to the Sunday law, it can have no standing in the courts, under the constitution, unless the judges are Christian partisans first and lawyers afterward. Mr. Huddleston should be helped to defend himself from robbery and oppression. Who among our wealthy Freethinkers will take hold of the matter and carry a case to the highest courts that can be reached?

Samuel P. Putnam's Engagements in England.

It will be seen by the following, taken from the Freethinker of London, that Charles Watts has already made eleven Sunday lecture engagements for Mr. Putnam, and that the week-day evenings are likely to be filled in all right. The Secular Pilgrim will be sure to write for us excellent reports of his travels, observations, and reception, and the only place where you will find those fascinating letters will be THE TRUTH SEEKER. This should be a sufficient hint to all Freethinkers who are not now subscribers, and to all present readers who want their friends to have something good.

"Mr. Charles Watts has made the following lecturing engagements for Mr. S. P. Putnam: May 5, Hall of Science, London; May 12, Camberwell; May 19, Bradford; May 26, Liverpool; June 2, National Secular Society Conference; June 9, Glasgow; June 16, Edinburgh; June 23, Manchester; June 30, Sheffield; July 7, South Shields; July 14, Bristol. Mr. Putnam will return to New York in August, therefore friends who have not engaged him should communicate with Mr. Watts at once. Societies near any of the above towns requiring week-night lectures should arrange for Mr. Putnam to visit them when he is in their district on the Sunday. Arrangements are making for him to speak in Derby and Stockton-on-Tees during the weeks following his being at Manchester and South Shields. Dundee should be visited when he lectures in Glasgow and Edinburgh."

A Little More Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "SELF CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self Contradictions of the Bible," to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to anything good.

"An Important Intimation."

There are, we regret to say, between one thousand and two thousand of our friends who have allowed their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to expire without renewing. This is a considerably larger portion than is pleasant to us, who depend upon the more or less prompt payment of subscriptions for the wherewithal to meet our bills. Now, we are not going to get angry, or scold, or do anything disagreeable about this, but we must appeal to our friends' good nature and generous feelings to remedy this deplorable and unsatisfactory state of affairs. We need the money badly—so do our creditors. The paper man, and the printer, and the compositor, and the mailer, and the post-office collector, and the clerks, and the landlord, and the insurance man, and the gas man, and the devil are always with us, not to mention the rest, and they all want money and want it bad, and want it when it is due. And when we haven't got it for them life is a burden—they make it so intentionally, blast 'em.

So now, as aforesaid, we appeal to our friends all over this country—thousands of them—to send the amount of their arrearages and as much in advance as they have been behind, to sort of even things up and turn about in fair play, as it were. A year's subscription from each one whose time has expired will make us easy—very easy—but if we can't have that then let us have what you can spare, and we will "grin and bear it" until you get the balance. The amounts are small individually and easily raised, but to us they collectively mean a good deal—just the difference between being even with the world and being unpleasantly behind.

The disciples of a certain philosopher, one day missing their teacher from his accustomed place in the midst of them, sought him at his unpretentious lodgings, where they discovered that he was suffering from the lack of a Square Meal. Of course they hastened to provide him with all that the inner sinner could desire, but he nevertheless took occasion to jab them with a moral pointed by the event. "Know, then" (said he), "that in order that you may permanently enjoy the light of a lamp, it is necessary occasionally to replenish the Oil."

Delinquents who renew at once will be spared the moral which their remissness might tempt us to draw.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS)

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

Lulie Monroe Power.

On a black-bordered note-sheet now lying before us there is only this, but it tells the story of the closing of the volume of a life:

"In the brief Daytime of Life, Love;
In the long Night of Death, Oblivion."

"Returned to Mother Nature, 11:24 A. M., April 21, 1895, Lulie Monroe Power, aged 45. Farewell at residence, 50 Fayette street, Thursday at 2 o'clock P. M., April 25th."

For several years Mrs. Power has been the editor of the Ironclad Age of Indianapolis. A recent number of the Sentinel of that city gives a portrait and short sketch of the Infidel editor. From the latter is gleaned the information that as a girl Mrs. Power set type in the office of the Seymour Times and there absorbed the belief of its Atheist editor. All the family were of the same opinion, and in the atmosphere thus generated she developed the ability and the desire to do the work she has since performed. Scorning the idea of God, she had no fear of post-earthly punishments, and neither had the orthodox heaven any attraction for her.

Mrs. Power is described as a woman of energy, courage, and impressiveness, having a square chin, prominent forehead, and keen eyes. Acknowledging that she felt the influence of the proscription that her active heterodoxy naturally engendered, she said that the proscription for opinion's sake was unmanly and mean, especially when it was remembered that "one man knows as much as another about an alleged future state."

She had been gradually failing in health for more than two years. The illness at first took the form of diabetes and she was not wholly free from it subsequently, but tubercle in the chest was the immediate cause of her death. From the time of the death of her only son, Erie Power, she has never been well. Her husband and her daughter Pearl survive her.

Samuel P. Putnam is off for England. He sailed on the City of Berlin on April 24. He carries with him the good wishes and warm friendship of thousands of American Freethinkers. The longer we know him the better we like him, and we are sure that he will most creditably represent us in the mother country. Good voyage and safe return!

The following sums have been received since last acknowledgment to be applied in the Minnesota school case. Mr. A. Fleckten, of Kandayohi, in that state, withdrew his children from the public school of his district on account of the obnoxious religious exercises in which their attendance compelled them to participate. It is proposed to appeal the case from the school board to the courts in order to determine if such exercises may not be prohibited, the school reclaimed for secular education, and Mr. Fleckten's children reinstated. Flora A. Burtis contributes $1; A. W. Tucker, 50 cents; Geo. Geer, $2 50; John McArdle, 50 cents; Peter Selde, Sr., $1; Caroline L. Rich, $1; Ezra Gladding, $1.

The county court of Rhea county, Tennessee, refused by a vote of 12 to 12 to release the imprisoned Adventists. It was argued by the Sabbatarians that the prisoners would violate the Sunday law again as soon as they were liberated. A few days later Governor Turney pardoned all whose terms had not already expired—five, we believe. The Adventists are making a hard fight against the Sunday statutes, and their political organ, the American Sentinel, is being sent out by the hundred thousand. The Colorado Tract Society sent for 10,000 in one order. The Tennessee struggle is attracting the attention of the entire country, and many newspapers are speaking out with more or less decision and clearness. The battle is on, now.

The Christian Statesman rejoices over the formation of the "Junior Republic" in Chicago, the organization of which Mr. Putnam wrote in warning some weeks since. It is a society for training the young in the principles and practice of government. Says the paper above named:

"The Constitution of the United States is of course taken as the basis of the organization, but this clause has been added: 'That the God of the Bible be recognized as authority.' The National Reform Association has not been doing its work in vain. This is but a shadowing forth and anticipation of the Christian amendment of the real Constitution of the United States."

The theocratic organ is right; the reactionary organization for which it speaks is making its influence felt, and if the friends of equal liberty do not arouse themselves as they have not hitherto done the mimic Christian government in Chicago is indeed but the forerunner of the national Christian government at Washington for which the Reform Association is striving.

On April 3d, in San Francisco, in the case of Mrs. Hynes against the Hibernia National Bank, Rev. Father McKenna was a witness. When called to the stand, Mrs. Hynes's attorney asked that he be excused from taking an oath, and the request was granted. This is something of a curiosity in its way, and raises several questions in the mind of the thoughtful reader. We believe that the oath or affirmation is obligatory upon all witnesses, and we can think of no good reason why the priest should have been excused. Of course, if he had conscientious scruples against taking the oath he should have been permitted to make affirmation, but such does not appear to have been the case. Considering the fact that, as a priest, he believed that false swearing would be followed by eternal consequences of evil which would not attend false testimony not given under oath, the suspicion is inevitable that there was evidence wanted by the lawyer from the priest which would not have been forthcoming had he been required to take the oath.

Some months ago the board of education of Ansonia, Conn., struck a streak of secular sense, and abolished religious exercises from the schools of the town. This made the Christians angry, as their interest in common schools would end if religion were taken out of them, and, figuratively speaking, they jumped on the board until its members called the local clergy together and asked them to unite upon some form of prayer which should be acceptable to all. The ministers selected the "Lord's prayer"! This selection seems to be highly approved by the religious press, and the Christian Advocate (Methodist) says:

"There is nothing in the [Lord's prayer] to prevent a conscientious Jew from uniting in it, or any other person, except a conscientious Atheist, the number of whom is probably not large enough to become a factor in any American community."

The devil there isn't!

But if there were only one Atheist in the whole country he would have the same rights and just as many of them as all the other fellows, singly and severally, and the laws and government should be so framed as to protect them. As the attorney for Ray Fram in the Kansas school case said: "One with the Constitution is a majority."

A police magistrate in Rockford, Ill., suspended the sentences of two prisoners so long as they should attend church regularly! Is it to be understood that the judge looked upon the church as a state institution of correction and punishment, established to accommodate the overflow from the jail? Or did he regard it as a moral influence because it threw the culprits among presumably respectable associates, or because religion was taught there? In the latter contingency it is pertinent to inquire where he got his authority for compelling even persons under jail sentences to attend religious services. Another question arises: Inasmuch as the sentences are suspended for so long as the men attend church regularly, what are they but life sentences to participate in religious exercises? We will suppose that the offenses of these men merited and received a sentence of thirty days each. Well and good, but no matter how exemplary their lives in future may be they are, under the terms of the magistrate's order, liable to be dragged away to jail to serve out the original sentences whenever they quit going to church on Sunday. That is, instead of their having alienated their liberty for thirty days by their own unsocial acts, the magistrate has possibly alienated it for thirty years, one day in every seven, under the delusion that he has a right to officially recognize the alleged moral or the religious influence of a church.

The funeral expenses of Sir John Thompson were defrayed by the Canadian government. One item in the bill was $1,000 for masses for the repose of the soul of the dead man. Referring to this, the Christian Statesman pertinently but inconsistently remarks:

"Thus the taxes of Protestants and non-believers are used by Roman Catholic priests to pray a Roman Catholic soul out of a Roman Catholic purgatory. This is a part of what the pope means when he writes to the American people and asks for 'the favor of the laws and the patronage of public authority.'"

Exactly, but it does not lie in the mouth of Dr. McAllister to rebuke either the pope or his priests. When the Covenanter insists that the Protestant Bible shall remain in the public schools he, in effect, says that the taxes of Catholics and non-believers shall be taken for the propagation of Protestant dogmas. When he defends the employment and payment of chaplains by the federal and state governments he is defending the use of the Freethinker's and Hebrew's money by the Catholic and the Protestant priests. When the God-in-the-Constitution party demands that none but Christians hold office, and that one-seventh of the time of all the citizens be given to the church, what is it asking if not that it receive "the favor of the laws and the patronage of public authority"? The American people must not forget that the Catholic asks for nothing that the Protestants have not demanded and, in many cases, obtained. The opposition of the Christian Statesman and its party to the Catholics is based on nothing more reputable than sectarian hatred and jealousy. Both factions want to control the state and use its machinery to force their creeds down the throats of everybody else. This is what "Christian citizenship" means.

The liberty to think and to teach is the core of Freethought. The word itself says that. He who would deny the right to express one's thought and teach it to one's children does not understand the genesis nor the genius of Freethought, even though he may call himself by the name of Freethinker. That Christians should clamor for the legal suppression of parochial schools is not a matter of surprise, for Christianity, of whatever denominational label, depends for its perpetuity upon force as a last resort. But the Freethinker would never dream of suppressing "by the strong arm of the law" the propagation of his opponent's beliefs. So long as parochial schools are supported by the voluntary contributions of Catholics or Lutherans, they have precisely the same rights under the law as it is, and under any just law, that Protestant schools of other kinds or secular schools have and would have. They have identically the same rights that Protestant Sunday-schools possess. This talk about suppressing them by law is from the lips of men who know no more about the spirit of our institutions and the demands of equal freedom than do Pope Leo XIII. and the College of Cardinals at Rome. What Protestant who favors such a crime could have the face to accuse any other sectarian of intolerance? And where does the logic of this demand lead the Protestant? If it is right to suppress the parochial schools of the Catholic church, why would it not be right to suppress the services in the Catholic churches? The alleged reasons given for the suppression of the former would be just as valid if advanced in support of a proposition to suppress the latter. And if either was thus suppressed, or if the suppression was attempted, wherein would the Protestants guilty of the insane wrong be superior to the Catholics who committed similar crimes when they had the power? What a spectacle for the nations that would be—"free America" sending men to prison for teaching their beliefs to their children! Why! the very excuses offered by the men who advocate this oppression are mere duplicates of those offered by the Catholic church for the wrongs which lie at its door. It is so easy to mask sectarian animosity behind charges of "treason," "immorality," and the like. And bigotry always needs such masks, let it be said to the credit of human nature.

HAWAII'S HADES.

The Truth About the "Missionary Government" of the Islands.

The daily papers have been devoting much space to the late uprising in Hawaii, with details of the swift and summary punishment of offenders by the missionary rulers, and probably nine-tenths of the readers have felt a glow of patriotic satisfaction that the "republican government" of the Islands has, "by the grace of God," thus nipped in the bud an incipient revolution and punished the rebels as they richly deserved.

To those who know what the situation in Hawaii really is, it would be amusing, if it were not revolting, to see this "mushroom government," as the London Chronicle rightly calls it, that exists only through the apathy of the peace-loving natives and the ignorance of the great majority of justice-loving Americans, thus gravely condemning people to death and exacting $10,000 fines as if it had a right to do anything of the sort. It reminds one of the decrees of Brudner Gardner in the Limekiln Club, where a member was fined $1,500 for throwing peanut shells on the floor and $1,000 for bringing in mud on his feet. Only Brudner Gardner's fines were in fun, while these missionary leeches are in earnest. Like all of the black-coated gentry, far and near, ancient and modern, these people are after the ducats.

More recent dispatches state that there will probably be no executions, the death sentences having been commuted to life imprisonment or exile, on payment of heavy fines. If everything goes well, the missionary usurpers will come out of this little disturbance with more cash in their pockets than they could have squeezed out of their "subjects" in years of their accustomed injustice and extortion.

There are two sides to the beautiful picture which the missionary government has held up for the admiration of the world, and it is about time that the reverse side was turned for public inspection. The daily press of the United States is too deeply involved in politics, or too much afraid of the "religious element," to tell the facts, and it remains for the independent TRUTH SEEKER to throw the light of truth on the nature of the hypocritical and cruel gang who, under the mask of a so-called republican form of government, have established a worse than Russian despotism, and are choking life and liberty out of the easy-going, peacefully inclined Hawaiians, for the sole benefit of their own pockets.

People who live in Honolulu, and many on the Pacific coast, know that the Hawaiian queen is an educated woman of much refinement and great kindness of heart. It is a matter of recent history that she was governing her people in a manner perfectly acceptable to them and to the world at large when her throne was wrested from her by a body of usurpers, assisted, it is shameful to say, by armed forces of the United States. Whether the leaders who granted that assistance were influenced by promises of a share of the spoils, or by ignorance of the real state of things, will perhaps never be revealed, now that ex-Minister Stevens is dead; but it is possible that, if the truth were known, President Cleveland's attempt to uphold the queen would be found to be one of the most creditable features of his administration.

The statements presented herewith are based on various letters from persons of veracity now living in Honolulu, and on information from a gentleman who lived there a long time but who is now a resident of the United States, his love of justice and hatred of hypocrisy making existence under the missionary rule unbearable. For however much a resident of Hawaii might deplore the tyrannical treatment constantly inflicted upon the natives by their grasping, self-righteous rulers, no one dared voice such sentiments aloud, for the reason that the government is exceedingly watchful, with spies everywhere, and prompt in making it unpleasant for anybody bold enough to criticize its methods. It seems strange, to those acquainted with the facts, that a spot so small as Hawaii, for years the target of so many curious eyes, has been able, through the wonderful nerve of its present rulers, to look the world in the face and even to pose in self-glorification as "the birthplace of those patriots [!], Dole, Smith, and Hatch," while underneath its smiling tropical sky its native children have been frightened into a state of slavish inactivity during a period of treason, dishonesty, bribery, and bigotry seldom, if ever, equaled. All mankind can behold an object-lesson (and a warning) in the popular form of government as adapted by Dole & Co. to fit Hawaii.

The greatest curse that ever fell upon the Sandwich Islands, aside from minor evils, most of which followed in his wake (such as rum, leprosy, Asiatic immigration, etc.), was the ever benevolent and immaculate missionary. Since the days of the Spanish Inquisition never have there existed so cold-blooded, so grasping, so Puritanical, so selfish, so bigoted a lot of "divines" as the first missionaries sent to Hawaii Nei. Through the help of the churches and Sunday-schools they were set down empty-handed in the Eden of the Pacific, and, following the example of their progenitor, Adam, they sinned. The natives of Hawaii, not being so wise as Yahweh, failed to eject them, and as a result they have turned the sun-kissed little islands into a climatically superior hell.

Dole, Judd, and others high in authority are the offspring of those earlier toilers who sowed the seed which they are now harvesting. There is little doubt that the august president of all Hawaii could recall, if his memory were jogged a little, the days of the old whalers and the wicky-wicky car.

It was the early missionary who, by levying on each native a tax of many pounds of sandalwood, or by giving in exchange for it an equal amount of rough pine lumber, entirely denuded the islands of that valuable wood.

It was the early missionary who, having taught the native to wear clothes as a good Christian should, sold him those same clothes for land worth a thousand times their value, or for the products thereof in like proportion—clothes given as a donation by benevolent people for sweet charity's sake.

It was such stock as produced Dole, Judd, and Hatch that introduced the famous wicky-wicky car, a sort of sedan-chair arrangement, to which were harnessed natives, who drew the missionary about the island on holy duties bent, urged to increased activity by punches from a pointed stick and the ejaculation, "Wicky, wicky!" (faster, faster) from which the car took its name.

The early missionary is dead, but the evil he did was not interred with his bones. It lives after him in many forms. For if he "saved" a few souls by persuading them to replace their superstitions with his own, their bodies and possessions paid dearly for the spiritual benefits. He left the natives sitting in the shadows of their former homes, dressed in Christian clothing and possessing a vague idea of the vicarious atonement, but a very clear one of those highly interesting and novel vices, gambling, intemperance, and the use of tobacco. He left them entering a new existence which must end in the extermination of the race. He found them the most honest, simple, trustful, cleanly, and interesting aborigines on the whole round earth, and he left them cursed and dying under the touch of civilization's withering fingers. And in Dole & Co. he left worthy successors to carry on the work he had begun. The characteristics of the missionary government of the Sandwich Islands are such as might be predicted in the descendants of such men.

Yet these people have the phenomenal assurance to torture American citizens in order to extort evidence against the so-called conspirators. Listen to the testimony of eye-witnesses as given in private letters published in that most conservative of San Francisco papers, the Call:

Men arrested on suspicion only were confined almost without food for twenty-four hours, and others were kept in the jails, two in a cell, for thirty-six days, no chance being given them to provide for their families, look after their business affairs, or even consult with their friends on these subjects. Every known method of extorting confessions was used to force them to give incriminating evidence against themselves so as to give the military tribunal grounds for charging them with treason.

A refined and accomplished young American girl felt the weight of the marshal's displeasure. While talking with a number of ladies she expressed sympathy with the ex-queen in her unfortunate plight, and the matter coming to the ears of the authorities, she was dragged, in company with her mother, to the common prison and roughly questioned by the marshal. He lectured her so coarsely and frightened her so much in warning her that she must never express her sentiments again, that she was taken down with nervous prostration and goes to San Francisco to recuperate.

The "military court," which is hired for monthly wages to sit in court-martial and deal out death sentences, contains a lot of queer characters. It comprises a Portuguese immigrant whose passage was paid by the government, a discharged telephone operator, a Dutch employee of a carriage repair shop, a clerk, a boy baseball player, a man whose wife got a divorce from him on the ground of extreme cruelty and brutality, fugitives from San Francisco justice, and "gold cure" graduates—a fine set of men to sit in judgment on the lives of others who are a hundred times their superiors.

Here is an extract from a private letter from Honolulu which confirms some portions of what I have written above:

It has been discovered that the authorities are buying up all the copies of the local papers containing the ex-queen's statement before the military court that they can find. The court did not intend to let the statement get abroad, and Paul Neuman is accused of giving it out. It made a sensation in Honolulu and the authorities are fearful of the sympathy it will create both here and in the world at large.

It was courageous and straightforward and shows her to be a good and great woman with the interests of her unfortunate people at heart.

The former resident of Honolulu, previously referred to, in conversation with myself relates many acts of injustice and cruelty to natives perpetrated by Dole and others of the missionary government, which it would take too much space to record here. But it seems quite plain, from the evidence that is coming to the surface, that the people of the United States will do well to investigate a little before they indorse all the acts of that upstart oligarchy of pious frauds, even though it conjures with the words "missionary," "republican," and "patriotism." And if all the well-meaning but misguided people who have been wasting and worse than wasting their money on foreign missions would use it to alleviate the distress or ignorance of their own fellow-citizens here at home the investment would show better returns.

Errors of the Bible.

It is astonishing how people can be led to believe that the Bible was written by the inspiration of a being supreme in knowledge, wisdom, justice, love, and mercy, when it contains scores, if not hundreds, of self-evident falsehoods, self-evident, at least, to any reader who has learned to think. The story of the flood is a self-evident falsehood. Admitting the world had been flat instead of round, as it was once thought to be, there never was water enough to cover the earth to the tops of the mountains, and Noah's ark would have been dashed in pieces on the mountains within twenty-four hours after it was launched.

The story about the whale swallowing Jonah is a self-evident lie. If Jonah had got into the belly of the whale he could not have lived there an hour. The whangdoodle Talmage used to preach about the whale swallowing Jonah, until he learned that the whale had not a throat large enough to swallow one of Jonah's feet, then he changed his tune and said that Jonah got a seat in the whale's mouth, and, if I mistake not, he said the whale's mouth was twelve feet wide and twelve feet deep, but that story will not do, for every little while the whale draws in his big mouth full of water, spits it up through the top of his head and swallows the small fish he strains out of it—that is his food and he can swallow nothing larger, and Jonah, if seated in the whale's mouth, would have been drowned at the first mouthful of water. But enough of one Bible lie sufficiently incredible to kill the inspiration of the whole book, if people have not been crazed by it.

The Bimetallic Problem.

Twenty-two years ago silver was demonetized by act of Congress. Senator John Sherman moved it and very few members knew what they were voting for. It is alleged that the repeal of the old free silver coinage law was brought about by £100,000 of British gold. The effect of that repeal has been not to reduce the actual value of silver, but to enhance the value of gold, which was thereby made the single basis. An ounce of silver will purchase as much goods now as it did in 1873, but an ounce of gold will purchase about fifty per cent more.

Since the repeal of the free silver coinage law the debtor has been paying two per cent more per annum than the legal or stipulated rate, because the value of the dollar, on the single gold basis, has been enhancing at that rate for twenty-two years past. Advocates of the single gold standard forbode disaster if we return to the double standard. Have we not had the disaster already by the demonetization of silver?

The bimetallic basis can be restored by an act of Congress making all debts payable one-half in gold and one-half in silver unless otherwise stipulated.

W. H. BURR.

The New York Independent, commenting on the decision of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin (cited by THE TRUTH SEEKER recently in "Educators and Editors on the Bible"), says:

"How any other conclusion could have been drawn from the premises, we are not able to see. . . . We see no escape from the conclusion reached, and have no desire to escape it, since we thoroughly believe in its correctness everywhere. . . . It remits the question of religious instruction, as to what it shall be, as to the agency giving it, and as to the cost thereof, to voluntary private and individual effort, and devotes the public school, created and regulated by law, and supported by a general taxation of the people, exclusively to secular education."

BIBLE READING NOT COMPULSORY

So the Court Decides in a Barber Co., Kansas, School Contest.

THE BOY WENT BACK A FREE AMERICAN.

Ray Fram, of Kiowa, Kan., Expelled from the Public School for Refusing to Take Part in Devotional Exercises, Appeals to the Law and is Reinstated by a Just Judge—Able Legal Argument by the Re'ator's Counsel.

Mr. R. Fram and his son Ray, of School District No. 5, Barber county, Kansas, have rendered a good service to the cause of the secular state. Writing to his friend Gleason, Mr. Fram tells the story as condensed below:

The school board of District No. 5 is composed of Oliver Ewell, Abner Wilson, and R. McAllister. The board adopted a rule that the pupils must lay aside their books while the teacher read the Bible, prayed, and conducted singing. Ray Fram declined to do so, and quietly pursued his studies while the teacher engaged in religious worship. After some days the teacher told Ray that he must obey the rule. He replied that he did not come to school for the purpose of worship; that the public school was not the place for religious services; that there were three churches in town for that purpose. The teacher answered that the Bible was such a beautiful history that every one ought to listen to it, and that Ingersoll and Paine taught no morals. This brought out the response from the Ray of light that they taught better morals than were inculcated by the Bible, and he offered to bring some selections from her "beautiful history" that she would be ashamed to read to the school. She promptly picked up the gauntlet, saying that there was nothing in the Bible too bad to read before the pupils. He then asked her if she would read some passages he would select for her, to which she replied that anything that he would bring would be read to the school. The next morning she was still ready for the ordeal, but when she saw the two passages he had for her she declined to read them. Ray informed her that he could keep her reading for half a day on excerpts of that nature, and he added that if men of to-day should do the deeds charged against Solomon and David and Lot by the Bible they would be lynched before night. Upon this the teacher said she would leave the matter to the board for its decision. The next morning the board was present and tried in a private conversation with young Fram to induce him to obey their rule. As he persisted in his refusal to take part in the religious exercises by laying aside his books, the board made a talk to the school, saying that when people left the Bible they went back to cannibalism, and that the rules of the school must be obeyed. If they did not obey they would be expelled. The succeeding morning, when Ray kept to his studies as usual, he was promptly expelled. Mr. Fram went to one of the board and asked him why his son had been turned out of the school. Of course the answer was because he had declined to suspend his work while the devotional exercises were in progress; the rules must be obeyed. "But," said the Freethinker, "that is an unjust rule; you have no right to make such rules." "We have the law for making such regulations," was the reply of the Christian director; "and they shall be obeyed. Any one who will throw the Bible aside is lower than a beast." Mr. Fram kept his temper in control and tried to argue the subject, but the director would not reason, simply insisting that Mr. Fram's boy could not be permitted "to run the school," while, of course, he had merely protested against a rule that the board had no authority for making. After this an attempt was made to discredit the cause of Mr. Fram by misrepresenting the conduct of his boy, but this was abortive, for even the teacher heartily commended Ray, aside from this one act.

Mr. Fram called upon the county superintendent and that official communicated with the state superintendent, but as they were both Christians of the narrow type they sustained the board. Then the outraged father applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the board to reinstate Ray. The case was argued before Judge McKay of the 24th Judicial District. Attorney A. L. Herr, assisted by Attorney Jesse J. Dunn, conducted the case for Mr. Fram, and the board was represented by no less than four lawyers. Judge McKay decided the case in the Freethinker's favor in a very few minutes after the conclusion of the arguments of counsel, affirming the boy's right to devote all his school time to his studies, and holding that the Bible could not be used in the public institutions of learning. We much regret that we have not the text of the decision. It does not need Mr. Fram's assurance to apprise us of the fact that the orthodox people of the neighborhood feel very bitter toward him. But he is happy, for, as he says, "Ray went back to school a free American." All honor to the father and to the son! Pledge them deeply, comrades! It is to such as these that we must look to stay the advance of the enemies of the civil republic. To the hosts of Theocracy they say—"Stop! you have come near enough."

In opening the argument in the district court, Attorney A. L. Herr, of Kiowa, said:

The question raised by the demurrer is one of great importance, not only to us as attorneys in the case, but to this great commonwealth, the state of Kansas. It is a question of personal rights and liberties; a question of religious freedom. I cannot help but see the danger that must necessarily follow by allowing the church to become connected and intermingled with our public schools. There can be no doubt that the rule adopted by the school board, opening the schools of Kiowa by reading passages from the Bible, and prayer, and compelling participation therein, is open violation of our constitution. But we are told by the pulpit and doubtless in your honor's hearing that such a statement as this is not founded upon reason. But I take it that your honor will tell these reverend learned gentlemen, "Sirs: You may be well versed in theology; but when it comes to deciding upon a constitutional question you step outside of the work for which you receive inspiration from your God and are not competent to judge." The numerous churches in our land to-day afford ample opportunity that all may become familiar with the needs of the soul. The danger of sectarian instruction in our public schools has been wisely guarded against by inserting in our constitution the following clause: "No religious sect or sects shall ever control any part of the common school or university fund of this state," and further anticipating the danger of using public money for private use the Constitution provides that "no tax shall be levied except in pursuance of law which shall distinctly state the object of the same, to which object only such a tax shall be applied." We claim that the rule of the school board is repugnant to the sections of the constitution quoted.

Following is the brief and argument, in part, of counsel for Ray Fram:

In order that a thorough understanding of the question may be had and that no hasty action may be taken in the matter we believe that it might not be unprofitable to inspect the provisions of our law under which the public school system is maintained and supported, and invite the attention of the court to Article 6 of our constitution, being the constitution of the state of Kansas, which article is entitled "Education;" under this title we find that provision is made for our entire public school system, and upon which the legislature afterward based the laws which now govern it.

A further inspection of Article 6 shows paragraph 184, which provides that

No religious sect or sects shall ever control any part of the common school or university funds of the state.

In accordance with these provisions we find that the legislature has established a system of schools throughout the state and has provided for all of the officers necessary thereto. Paragraph 5755 provides that

Public schools in incorporated cities which have not less than two hundred and fifty and not over two thousand inhabitants, if not otherwise provided for by law, shall be governed by the provisions of this act which apply to the organization and maintenance of district schools or of union or graded schools.

Kiowa is a city of the third class and its schools, in accordance with this paragraph, are conducted as the district or graded schools. We will now direct the attention of the court to paragraph 5576, by which we find that Every school district shall be deemed duly organized when the officers constituting the district board shall have been elected and qualified, and shall have signified their acceptance to the county superintendent in writing which the superintendent shall file in his office.

A perusal of this article shows to us that the entire supervision of the district schools lies in the school board, composed of director, clerk, and treasurer, and among other powers set out in this article is that found in paragraph 5619, which says:

The district board may suspend or authorize the director to suspend from the privileges of a school any pupil guilty of immorality or persistent violation of the regulations of the school, which suspension shall not extend beyond the current quarter of the schools. Provided that the pupil expelled shall have the right to appeal from the decision of the said board of directors to the county superintendent, who shall, upon a full investigation of the charges preferred against said pupil, determine as to his guilt or innocence of the offense charged, whose decision shall be final.

It was under this section that Ray Fram was expelled. The section provides that he shall have the "right of appeal to the county superintendent," but does not restrict him to this as his sole remedy, and believing that his interests would be better protected he comes to this court. The section provides that "the district board may suspend or authorize the director to suspend any pupil guilty of immorality or persistent violation of the regulations of the school." This defines the ground upon which a pupil may be suspended or expelled, and in order that it may be lawful it must come under one of the two reasons assigned above. If Ray Fram had not been guilty of the first of these, and it is conceded that he had not, it must be under the second of these reasons that the board found grounds to suspend or expel him. In other words, Ray must have been guilty of "persistent violation of the regulations of the school." If he was not guilty of this, or if the regulations demanded by the board were not in accordance with law, and hence void and of no force, then he was wrongfully suspended or expelled and, in accordance with our prayer, should be reinstated. This phase of the question we will treat of further along.

Article 5 of the chapter relating to schools pertains to the regulation of district schools, such as the one in question in accordance with paragraph 5755, relating to cities of the third class, and paragraph 5634 of the same provides for the branches to be taught in the said schools, and reads as follows:

That in each and every school district shall be taught orthography, reading, writing, English grammar, geography, and arithmetic, and such other branches as may be determined by the district board, provided that the instruction given in the several branches to be taught shall be in the English language.

Bible reading or prayer is not a branch of study; both are forms of religious exercise and worship, and we say without fear of contradiction that it was never the intention of the legislature to pass a law to encourage sectarian or religious instruction in the public schools; and no rule made by the district board and tending to that end can receive the sanction of a court for a moment. If a child must stifle his conscientious convictions in order that he be permitted to attend the public schools, how far will we have to travel that road until the Inquisition shall once more have full sway? And if a man must pay tribute to support a form of worship that is opposed to his ideas of right and justice, let us by one voice strike from our state constitution that part where it says that "No religious sect or sects shall ever control any part of the common school funds of the state." While we might be unjust, we would at least be absolved to this extent of liability of being called hypocrites. If no religious sect or sects can control the funds of the common school directly, neither can they do it indirectly by forcing the doctrines into the schools via the praying and Bible-reading mentioned and complained of. As to whether this is sectarian instruction or control we refer the court to Weiss et al., vs. the District Board of Edgerton, found in the 44th Northwestern Reporter, wherein it is held that

The sectarian instruction prohibited in the common schools by the constitution of Wisconsin, Article 10, Section 3, is instruction in the doctrines held by one or the other of the religious sects, and not by the rest; and hence the reading of the Bible in such schools comes within this prohibition, since each sect, with few exceptions, bases its peculiar doctrines upon some portion of the Bible, the reading of which tends to inculcate these doctrines.

We do not apprehend that this court, nor any other court, would hold or maintain that Bible reading and praying was not worship or religious instruction. It is a matter of common knowledge that it is by reading the Bible and by praying that nearly or quite all of the religious denominations conduct their various sectarian exercises all over this land. If you should take these two elements from the said exercises there would be little or nothing left in the form or nature of worship. And we desire to once more reiterate that these things cannot of right be conducted in our public schools at public expense, for the reason that public money cannot be put to that use and the schools, for a further reason, were not established for this purpose. However short the exercises may be the appropriation of the money, or "any part of the common school funds," to the support of them is unconstitutional and prohibited. There is no such thing as non-sectarian religion. All religion, in its generally accepted meaning, is sectarian; it cannot be anything else as long as individual minds think for themselves; so that the introduction of any religious instruction into the schools is and must be sectarian instruction, and the use of money to support it is inhibited by the constitution.

"No religious sect or sects shall ever control any part of the common school or university funds of the state" means, having been placed in the constitution, that if a school board attempts to divert such funds to the use of any religious sect or sects, and attempts to do this by a rule or regulation effecting that end, any action that they may take to enforce such rule or regulation is void; and as the board in question has expelled Ray Fram under such a rule he is entitled to be reinstated, and it is their duty to see that he is, under paragraph 5637, which prescribes a penalty for refusing or neglecting to do so.

When we read the Constitution of the United States we find as its first amendment that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

When the Board of Inquisition at Kiowa hear of that passage—for it is not to be presumed that they ever heard of it before—what a feeling of commiseration will come over them for the weaknesses of a body like Congress! They know that a school board can not only establish a religion, but can enforce its doctrines by expulsion, if necessary. They know, too, that they can prohibit the free exercise of any other religion except their own. Then how could they help but weep for Congress in its weakness? A justice of the peace once overruled the Supreme Court of the United States; why should not a school board arrogate to itself powers even above the most high?

We turn from the Constitution of the United States, that conservator of our national liberties, and appealing to the constitution of our own state, we read in paragraph 89, under the title of "Religious Liberty," that

The right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience shall never be infringed; nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship; nor any control of or interference with the rights of conscience be permitted nor any preference given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. No religious test or property qualification shall be required for any office of public trust, nor for any vote at any election, nor shall any person be incompetent to testify on account of religious belief.

To put the same language into different words, the framers of the constitution say that religion is one of those things that is not needed in our business, and that they would not pay for it. "That no religious sect should ever control any part of the common school fund." That so far as the state was concerned a man of one religious view was as good as a man of any other. The state never intended to pay for any religious instruction in its common schools; it made no provision for it, but it provided that it should not be. Hence the action of the school board was without warrant of law, and Ray Fram disobeyed no law that was of binding force upon him, and his expulsion being wrongful, he should be returned.

Without a doubt this is the most extraordinary affair that we have ever heard of happening within our limited experience. If it had happened in the year of 1595, or even in the year of 1695, it might then not have appeared so strange; but centuries have crowded themselves between us, Pope Innocent IV., and the Inquisition, and we have deemed that civilization's touch had stilled the hand of torture and confiscation in the name of religion. We had been taught that in this age and land our civil and religious liberties were thoroughly protected by our constitutions and system of laws which shielded all alike; with that kind of an education, what would your honor think of our sensations when we were informed by our client here that he had been expelled from the public school for not conforming to the worship as it was prescribed by this school board? It is true that he was not thrown into a dungeon nor stretched along the rack, but the spirit which would do one is the same that would prompt the other. The power alone is lacking; if this were supplied, the Inquisition would be here.

Once more we invite the attention of the court to our own state constitution, and we read in the face of these facts language which sounds like the empty and hollow tones of hypocritical mockery:

The right to worship God, according to the dictates of conscience, shall never be infringed; nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship, nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted, nor any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or form of worship.

Suppose that Ray Fram, instead of coming to your honor and asking to be reinstated in the public school from which he has been wrongfully expelled or suspended, had simply taken to the school board that one passage from the state constitution and asked them to explain what it meant; what explanation do you suppose they would have made to the boy who stood before them pleading to be permitted to attend the public school, and to be permitted at the same time to be true to himself and his religious convictions? What could they have said when he pointed to that part wherein it says that "the right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience shall never be infringed?" What reply could they have made when he had read to them a continuance of the same clause, "nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship, nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted?" We are at a loss to imagine any one whose station in life or whose duties would be more arduous, or whose position would not be enviable to theirs. It seems to us that, like Zekle,

They'd stand awhile on one foot fast,
And then a spell on tother,
An' on which one they'd feel the wust,
They couldn't ha' told ye nuther.

Now, your honor, we believe that if the language means anything it means just what it says: That the right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience shall not be infringed; and we believe that it applies just as much to Ray Fram's conscience as it does to the conscience of the different members of that school board; and we further believe that if the legislature could not make a law that would be valid, infringing the dictates of conscience, then neither could the school board, a creature of the legislature. We further believe that if the regulation made by the school board did infringe the rights of conscience of Ray Fram his non-observance of the said rule was no such "persistent violation of the regulations of the school" as would justify the board in suspending or expelling him, and hence he should of right be reinstated.

We further contend, your honor, that it is the duty of the school board to see that every child of school age, and such is our client, not only has the opportunity to attend the public schools, but that he does so. We further contend that when under these circumstances any child is compelled by this means to attend the public school, they ought not to be permitted to force upon that child any religious instruction whatsoever which the child says is against his religious convictions and an infringement upon his conscience. The reason is plainly set out above, but there is a further statement upon the matter, so that every phase of the subject might be covered, and that is, "nor shall any person be compelled to attend or support any form of worship." Your honor, the language is too plain to be mistaken. It is too clear to need even comment. It means just what it says, and its intention was of the wisest and best. It meant to protect the few from the many. It meant to protect the weak from the strong. It meant in this present instance that if the school board of the public schools of Kiowa turned Ray Fram out of school because he would not worship God according to the dictates of their consciences, your honor could step in and say to them: "You are wrong; school is not the place for Bible reading and prayer, and if it is conducted there you cannot at expense of expulsion compel pupils to participate therein. There are more of you than there are of Ray Fram, but one citizen and the Constitution make a majority, and this is a government of majorities. You are of greater size than the boy, but size counts for nothing when dealing with rights. Ray Fram is entitled to go to that school, he is eligible in every way; your suspension was a mistake, and you are now ordered to return him to all of the privileges thereof."

Observations.

Putnam effected his escape to England last week under the happiest auspices. Colonel Ingersoll sent him a letter instructing him to be a good boy and hurry right back. President Bird of the Newark Liberal League presented a pillow of flowers to him, with "Bon Voyage" on it, almost big enough for a man of the Pilgrim's stature to bunk on, and the wharf swarmed with a congregation who waved their handkerchiefs with one hand and wished him good luck with the other. My offerings were oral. I told him that if he did not desire to be mistaken for a provincialist he must endeavor to cultivate his accent on the outward trip. For example, he would be expected to pronounce "been" to rhyme with "seen;" his oratory over there must appear as oratory, or he would be understood as referring to one of their political parties, and if speaking of St. George he should conceal the a and r and give the native S'n Jaudge. Should his friends inquire if he was "bad" coming over, let him not construe the question as touching his personal conduct, but rather take it as showing a kindly interest in the state of his health. "Bad" is English for seasick, and as Britons are never sick, but "ill," and as ill means bad, and as "seail" would be questionable according to standards of euphony, "bad" is made to do general duty. He must call a pitcher a jug, and forget the associations that cling about the little brown article in this country. He will not need to take ashore with him, when he lands, the h's he has been fond of using in "who," "where," "while," and so on, for "oo," "were," and "w'ilst" will carry him through without criticism. And I finally warned him that London was a wicked city to one familiar only with New York, Chicago, Boston, and San Francisco, and that his safest course would be to keep close to Charles Watts. If all this counsel does not bring him back unsullied, then the next time it becomes necessary to trust one of us abroad I shall go myself. I have resided in Snohomish, Wash.

Globe-trotters who have visited the so-called holy land of Palestine inform us, in accents which denote surprise, that the alleged tomb of Jesus Christ at Jerusalem is guarded by Mohammedan soldiers whose onerous duty it is to suppress outbreaks of hostility between Christians who have journeyed thither to worship at the mausoleum of their savior, the prince of peace. It is a statement which I can believe without drawing on the stock of credulity that I keep on hand for use in emergencies when it is inappropriate to call people liars, for similar precautions are observed wherever one Christian sect touches elbows with another. It is unnecessary to say that the office of preserving such peace as is possible under the circumstances is performed by unbelievers, in the absence of whose interference the various sects would be at one another with deadly weapons oftener than they are now. Examples: In Savannah, Ga., not long since, a Jew, the mayor of the city, was obliged to interpose his authority to protect Protestants from the felonious assaults of Catholics. In Waverly, Pa., an Agnostic appeals to the courts to restrain Protestants from forcing obnoxious religious instruction upon the children of Catholics. In Amesbury, Mass., a Freethinker is alone in protesting against the discharge of a school teacher on account of her religious belief. In Tennessee one sect of Christians put members of another sect in jail, and none but the persecuted sect and the unbeliever in all sects makes strenuous objection. Other examples will be recalled by the reader, and new ones are likely to occur before these remarks appear in print. The war is bound to go on until religion yields to reason, or until the strongest sect secures peace on earth by imprisoning all the rest, in which latter event there will be tumultuous rioting inside the jails where the dissident factions are confined.

New lies will not cease to be told so long as there are fools who believe the old ones and intelligent persons who profess to do so. A widow from Allegheny, having for some months devoted herself to church work in Wooster, O., agitated the religious circles of the last-named place a while ago by having a girl baby. When asked for an explanation of such conduct as that, she made affidavit that one Father Abraham, also of Allegheny, Pa., was her only excuse. When Father Abraham came to Wooster he was arrested and arraigned before the mayor. The woman stated on the witness stand that since the death of her husband, a year before the birth of the child, her conduct had been exemplary; that the child involved was of divine paternity, and that she had given Father Abraham as its authority because God told her to. Father Abraham enthusiastically indorsed the lady's theory that the infant had no earthly father; whence it appears that human nature has not changed much since 1,895 years ago next Christmas. For Joseph, the husband of Mary, in whose case was illustrated the well-known physiological truth that the eldest child is liable to be an early one, did not argue the question with those who accepted the divine paternity of his firstborn. Like Father Abraham of Allegheny, he was sufficiently astute to keep his own counsel and let well enough alone.

Max Nordau's book on "Degeneration" is the timeliest work that has been published since I learned to read and reflect. Many sapient reviewers have pointed out its application to the fall of Oscar Wilde, but it seems to me that that is the least significant of the many instances of degeneration which he mentions. The most glaring cases of decadence are not in the moral but in the religious world, especially in England, where theology has reduced Gladstone from a Grand Old Man to a grand old humbug, and turned Romanes, the student of nature, to a stammering apologist for superstition; while Balfour, a rising statesman, is dragged back to that plane of mysticism where he is capable of writing a book on the "Foundations of Belief," in which he puts forth the statement that "there is better evidence for the existence of a God than for the existence of the physical world around us." It is scarcely worth while to mention W. E. Stead, of Christ and Chicago notoriety, although, with Brunetiere and other French degenerates, he proclaims that the sun of science is setting.

One of our daily papers, noting the theological trend among Englishmen of prominence, inquires why it is that American statesmen, since Jefferson (who cannot be counted because he was an unbeliever), have made no contributions to religious literature; and the editor adds that "England is ahead in this respect." Now, why did not the writer ask why we have no Oscar Wildes and (according to Wilde's accuser) Lord Roseberys? Here is surely a coincidence, for in that respect, too, England is "ahead." The solution may perhaps be found in the fact that Americans have been too busy thus far to yield to the theological mania that has overtaken the older people across the Atlantic. Our statesmen, i. e., politicians, find time for working the religious racket only on Sunday in the Sabbath-schools and on week days in the halls of Congress. The hope of England is its strong Freethought and Materialistic contingent and the spread of disbelief among the masses, who are not degenerate but rising.

I knew a minister who had spent ten or more years of his life as a missionary in Hawaii, and who voluntarily returned to this country. His reason for jumping the job was a good one, though he admitted that the missionary field there was enlarging. In the first place, he said, kahunaism (which, I believe, is the Kanaka superstition) is likely to last as long as there is a full-blooded native, and so is their system of morals, or immorals. A missionary's heaviest work now is reforming the imported vices taught the islanders by resident and visiting Christians. But as the same evils exist here, and as he preferred the United States as a place of residence, he felt no compunction in leaving Hawaii for a wider field. If all missionaries were equally candid, I apprehend that they would stay at home.

The New Woman, according to illustrative cuts printed in the newspapers and magazines, wears a two-legged dress, lights matches on the garboard strake thereof, and smokes cigarettes. Dr. Parkhurst accuses her of "anthromania," that is, mannishness, but the doctor thereby shows that he is incompetent to distinguish between masculinity in a woman and effeminacy in a man. For cigarette smoking is not distinctively a manly trait, while wearing the bifurcated garment is only putting in outward evidence an article of female apparel which, it is believed, is quite generally worn with inward grace by members of that sex. But we need not follow this division of our subject further. The fusee and the suit to match, or in other words the clothes and the match to suit, we may patiently abide; but why the cigarette? Why will the New Woman stain her fingers, discolor her breath, parch her throat, impair her voice, taint her atmosphere, her hair, and her clothes, deaden her natural instincts, and make herself half-brother to the insensate dude by smoking cigarettes? What is her objection to a pipe?

The French Marquis de Castellane recently spent fifteen days in this country, and has written an article on America and Americans, in which he says that the love of money is the besetting sin of our people as a whole. The marquis will be remembered as the gentleman who has just sprung into prominence in Paris by swapping off his son for the daughter of Jay Gould and fifteen millions of the deceased financier's dollars to boot, and who excited the admiration of the commercial world by his foresight in securing two millions of the same for himself as a condition precedent to his signing the marriage contract. We think we are pretty shrewd, but our millionaires would starve to death in competition with the noble non-producers of continental Europe.

Herr Otto Wettstein, of Neue Schlossstrasse 10, Heidelberg, Baden, having addressed a letter to me, I cannot do otherwise than make a stagger at replying to it, though I would that the cup might pass from me. The more I contemplate his extraordinary composition, the less confidence I have in my ability to do it justice. If long acquaintance with the writings of my valued friend had not convinced me that his mental works are provided with a chronometer balance, adjusted to the heat and cold of argumentative discourse, I might suspect that one of old Hans Sachs's "Nuremberg eggs," minus its verge, had in some way got into their place, and that the wheels of the same were revolving rapidly. But that is unthinkable in Herr Wettstein's case—both watch and brain case being included—and I must look elsewhere for the cause of his peculiar literary construction. I do not have to look far, though, for his allusion to Roget's "Thesaurus" furnishes a clue that a blind man could follow with his stick. If he is in the habit of thinking in easy words, and then going to the "Thesaurus" to find hard ones that mean the same thing but do not express it, then the mystery is solved and the "break" is located.

The statement of Mr. Wettstein, after quoting which I inquired, "If Otto can do that sort of thing while 'musing' dreamily, what couldn't he do if he should write when he is asleep?" was as follows: "To postulate eternal potencies eternally inactive; then, suddenly, becoming active, is infinitely more irrational than eternal potencies eternally active." I understood him to mean that in the absence of proof it is more reasonable to assume the existence of a power that is always active than of an eternally dormant one which suddenly became active. If that was his meaning, I was at a loss to understand why he did not say so. But the force of an observation lies in its application, and the present one is accepted as applying to the contention of the Yahwists that after an eternity of loafing the deity had a spasm of industry, lasting a week of six working days, during which time he created the universe. An "eternal potency" that never did but one week's work might almost be called one of the non-productive class. So it was not the thought that provoked me to "sardonically comment" upon Brother Wettstein's sagacious observation, nor yet the matter. It was the Thesaurus. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The "Humanizing" Influence of the Bible.

It is constantly asserted by Christians that there is no other book so valuable as the Bible as a manual of morals and that it must be used in the public schools if we do not want to see the social structure fall in a mass of ruins. Reviewing S. R. Gardiner's "History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate," Mr. Benjamin S. Terry incidentally throws a side light on the Bible as a humanizing power. We quote from the Dial of April 16th:

"Cromwell belongs to the seventeenth century. In the nineteenth century, with such shadows as Drogheda and Wexford in the background, his religiousness becomes despicable cant. He is a compound of Pecksniff and John Girdlestone. The one he surpasses in meanness and the other in cold-blooded villainy. But Cromwell does not belong to the nineteenth century. He belongs to the seventeenth. The treaty of Westphalia was scarcely a year old when his ferocious soldiers were roasting Irishmen in the towers of Drogheda or knocking priests on the head at Wexford. Cromwell was a saint of the Old Testament rather than of the New. The religious books that the good Ulphilas had once thought too exhilarating for his half-trained Gothic Christians were altogether the favorite reading of Cromwell and the stern-browed men who followed him. Their political creed was a short one. The pious were to rule the state. Those who resisted were to be as Agag before Samuel, or as the Canaanite before Israel. The symbol of the commonwealth was the sword of Joshua rather than the staff of John. The violent contrast between the pious ejaculations ever upon the lips of Cromwell, and his ferocious cruelty, do not prove him to have been either a hypocrite or a madman, any more than in the case of Joshua or Samuel."

In other words, Cromwell was neither a hypocrite nor a madman, but a sincere believer in the divinity of the Bible, and so drenched Ireland in the blood of massacre in his attempt to obey the commands of its God.

He Was Not Satisfied.

The following is a copy of a letter sent to the eloquent pastor of a Congregational church in West Fifty-seventh street, this city:

DEAR SIR: In your discourse last Sunday evening on Infidels and Agnostics you dramatically told the audience that when about thirteen years old you read Gibbon, Volney's "Ruins," Paine's "Age of Reason," etc., and that they did "not satisfy" you. Having opportunity and inclination, a boy of that age may gobble a great amount of literature without appreciating the weight or want of evidence, making use of reason, or becoming satisfied. Permit me to ask if, when at a maturer age you read Baxter, Doddridge, etc., you were satisfied? Can you reconcile the differences between Luther and Calvin to your satisfaction? Are you satisfied that Dante was not an unbeliever?—that he did not, like the author of Don Quixote, try to portray a popular belief in such ludicrous and revolting views as to create disgust and doubt in the minds of all who dare to think? Are you satisfied that the first Christian emperor was guided by a holy God?—that he did not adopt a shrewd policy merely to beat his rivals? Are you satisfied that the Christian fathers were competent judges of testimony?—that they were not crazed in habitual contemplation of supernatural vagaries? As Josephus lived and wrote immediately after the alleged occurrence of gospel marvels and miracles, are you satisfied with the few parenthetical and interpolated lines regarding them in his otherwise minute history? Are you satisfied that Herod, a dependent of Rome, gave orders to murder all the boy babes in Bethlehem? Are you satisfied that a God ever ordered the sudden death at midnight of the first-born of all the Egyptians? Are you satisfied that the destruction of man and beast in bulk by drowning was a wise way to improve them?—satisfied that Yahveh did or did not—

From mercy-seat on sapphire throne,
Perched high in space above,
Survey the wreck and hear the moan—
This holy God of love?

Does Collector Matthew's strait gate, through which a rich man cannot enter, satisfy you? Are you satisfied that the charge in Revelation that nearly all the early Christian churches were corrupt is true? On reading its denunciations, its threatenings, of its lake of fire and brimstone into which all who are not properly "marked" will be cast, etc., are you satisfied that the author of that book was not the champion hater of all men who differed with him? And are you satisfied that a real God was ever born on the earth in the similitude of a Jewish babe? Finally, are you now more nearly satisfied than you were at thirteen years of age?

These pertinent questions on old subjects are respectfully propounded by a satisfied Agnostic.

No satisfactory answer to any of these questions has been received. L. G. REED.

M.; Marysville, Carbondale, and Topeka, Kan. Those desiring lectures along this route please write her at once 1037 W. Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

THE De Ruyter, N. Y., Gleaner reprinted Franklin Steiner's lecture on "The Struggle for Religious Liberty," from the Federation and Union pamphlet. The Liberals of Newton, Ia., have reprinted from THE TRUTH SEEKER in tract form, Mr. Steiner's article, "Does Christianity Prevent Crime?"

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Long Island Business College, South 8th street, between Bedford and Driggs avenues. Program for May:

May 5th—"Practicability of Single Tax." G. F. Stephens

Letters of Friends.

For the Wise Fund.

ST. THOMAS, March 31, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of 23d inst. has just reached me; I hasten to avail myself of the mail of to-morrow to inclose $2 towards the fund for Mr. J. B. Wise, under prosecution for mailing a verse of the "word of God" to one who makes his living by it.

Religion, hypocrisy is thy name.

Yours in haste, S. DURANT.

The Book of Books—Not the Bible.

BELMONT, TEX., April 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am sixty-two years to-day, and have just returned from Biscayne Bay, Fla., where I spent the winter. I received "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought" with some other books last November. Pardon me when I attempt to express my idea of the book of all books. The author (Mr. Putnam) has gleaned every field for truth, hence the student may eat and be filled with knowledge. Long may the glorious Putnam live; may he enjoy his visit to England's Liberals, and have a safe return to his loved ones.

Yours for truth, J. C. SPEER.

Evidences of Divine Favor.

COLLEGE PLACE, WASH., April 7, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: We lately had a heavy wind which caused much damage. With the rest, it wrecked Valley Chapel church; blew the tin roof from the Seventh-Day Adventist College, and knocked three chimneys from Whitman College, a religious institution. It also damaged a Catholic church, a Congregational church, and a Baptist church quite badly, and did some little damage to other churches. They ought to pay their taxes and be honest; they might then find more favor with a just God, if there be any. The Bible says "the righteous shall flourish" (Ps. xcii, 12). "Whatsoever he (the godly man) doeth shall prosper" (Ps. i, 3), and there are many other passages to the same effect, but I see no greater prosperity among Christians and their institutions than with the Infidels. The Adventists say these bad storms are the works of the devil. Now, I want to say to the devil, through THE TRUTH SEEKER (he surely reads it, doesn't he?), Don't spill any more petroleum for me; I am one of your Infidels.

Yours truly, A. L. McFARLANE.

An Open Letter to Anthony Comstock.

AKRON, O., April 7, 295.

Inasmuch as thou art the great head of your society of co-workers for the prevention of crime, and to prevent the carrying of obscene literature in our United States mail, etc., you will allow me to ask and pray that you look well to the matter in all its aspects, for our land is now in the hands of Satan and sadly in need of repair; our Sun-days are being desecrated by those who blaspheme the God of our existence and daily read from a book of ignorance, known as the Holy Bible, and which tells the most damnable stories regarding a certain god, by name Jehovah, attributing to him the nature of a god and teaching that he is filled with fear, regret, revenge, and other human feelings. They also teach that his amanuensis was a murderer and taught his followers to borrow gold, silver, and other valuables, and skip away in the night. Further, his vice-gerents—by persecution in different ways—are trying to force us to accept him as God. They would close our theaters and other places of amusement on Sunday, and prohibit the sale of fruit, soda water, cigars, milk, sugar-plums, and such other commodities, that we may be forced to attend their places of blasphemy and pay tribute to this god. They have already, in the past, cropped people's ears, pulled out their tongues, bored out their eyes, and burned millions at the stake.

My advice is that you use a liberal supply of Colgate soap and purify the character and teachings of our entire land and let no guilty rascal escape.

See to it that the D.D.'s. are not allowed to contaminate our innocent children with their erroneous teachings.

All men and others need eyes, ears, tongues, brains, and other members of their natural body with which to transact a general business and follow the natural vocations of life, and should not be shorn of these by the decrees of theocracy.

Yours for justice, and believe me with you in heart and hand to eradicate both vice and vice-gerents from our land.

Barbers Must Rest on Sunday in California.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Without discussion or agitation, as quietly as water runs in a canal, a little bit of Sunday law was run through our last venal and unprincipled legislature, where rumors of bribes and combines were rife at its closing hours, and everything went to show that money was the all-potent power for which our Solons talked and worked. Of course this little "Sunday rest" law is above suspicion of boodle, for there was none back of it, as the barbers who wanted to rest on Sunday, but couldn't until compelled by law, are not possessed of much of a sack. It beats hell, in my opinion, how boodlers, whose votes are for sale to the highest bidder, if we can believe their associates—and I can without effort—are always anxious to preserve the sanctity of the day dedicated to God and old Sol. They are great sticklers for religious rest and Sunday morality, and now they have done the barbers one favor I wish they would do them another, and pass a law compelling them to attend divine worship Sunday, and to sit on seats provided by Watson Heston, and made in accordance with his illustration. It would be the proper sequence to the Sunday closing of barbers' shops, for if barbers don't know enough to shut up shop that day without a compulsory law, it is a logical conclusion that they don't know enough to attend church and thus insure salvation for their souls, and should be made to. If I go to the next legislature—and I hereby announce myself a "receptiv candidate" like your Uncle Ben Harrison for the presidency—I will see that such a bill is introduced.

C. SEVERANCE.

Fruits of that Awful "Continental Sunday."

JANESVILLE, April 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just returned from a very pleasant trip to Milwaukee, where I lectured before the Liberal Club, which meets in a large and beautiful hall on Milwaukee street. The Sunday evening meetings are attended by a large and very intelligent audience, and quite animated discussions follow the lectures. The Liberal Club is regarded with a great deal of favor in the city even by the orthodox. Rabbi Heck, who has the largest synagogue here, is on record as having declared that the Liberal Club was doing more good than all the churches.

I paid a visit Sunday afternoon with Professor Severance, with whom I stopped during my stay, to a German kindergarten on the south side. Every Sunday afternoon the people belonging to the society meet and have music and theatricals, and eat cake and ice cream, and drink coffee or beer. They seem to be a very happy and contented lot of people, and make Sunday a day of thorough enjoyment. We found on our arrival that the entertainment that day was by the children, tots of five or six years old, who sang and recited very much to their own and everyone else's enjoyment. Professor Severance enjoyed it thoroughly and kept remarking to me that this was his sort of religion. It is very certain that children brought up this way will never make religious fanatics, or sit up late nights wondering how they can get God into the Constitution.

Milwaukee is undoubtedly the most Liberal city in the United States. You can do there on Sunday precisely what you can on Monday, or any other day of the week. This makes some of the preachers very wrathful, and they are continually importuning the mayor to suppress this or that, but the mayor always tells them that inasmuch as Milwaukee has the best police record of any city in America, he doesn't think it would be advisable to make any changes.

Professor Severance is president of the Liberal Club, and is a Liberal and a gentleman after my own heart. He says that Milwaukee is very dear to him, because he can breathe there the air of true freedom without hurt or hindrance, and he doesn't think he would be satisfied to live anywhere else. As a city it is one of the brightest, cleanest, and most beautiful anywhere in the West.

Yours fraternally,

MORRIS M. BOSTWICK.

Fired Without Aiming.

RUTLAND, VT., April 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of April 13th Mr. C. Severance says that several months ago he bought a church pew, since which time his condition as a wage slave has materially improved. Because of his investment in a church pew he has been successful in finding a master for whom he can toil—under a system of wage slavery which gives to the master all the products of the slave's labor, except just enough to keep the slave from starving. He says that since he got that pew he has not wanted for a job, "although numerous cases of suicide are taking place all over this state [California] for that reason."

Now, it occurs to me that Mr. Severance has, under a vicious social system, improved his condition as a wage slave at the expense of his fellow-man. No benefit has accrued to mankind because of his playing the hypocrite and buying a church-pew for personal gain.

In the course of his letter he says: "Just before the last birthday of the Lord's son I felt the need of a good turkey to properly commemorate that anniversary, and going into a place where such birds were being raffled off, I laid down my five cents and entered the contest with the dice box and eighteen competitors. The Lord being with me of course I won, and a fourteen-pound turkey became mine."

This was meant as a kind of satire on the superstitious folly of church people; but it does not seem to have occurred to him that when he shook dice with his eighteen competitors, at five cents apiece, and won, he took from each of them five cents—of the product of their labor—without having in any way rendered service therefor; without being of use to himself or his fellow man, except as a robber.

We Freethinkers must be moral, must be just, and fight wrong-doing wherever we find it! It is a vicious system of wrong-doing we have to contend with. Society is religiously, politically, and socially honeycombed with fraud. We must first get the beam out of our own eye, that we may see clearly to get the mote out of our brother's eye.

A. A. ORCUTT.

[If Friend Orcutt will read Mr. Severance's letter again he will see that the latter gentleman did not buy a pew in a church but a pew from a dismantled church, and so the remark about "playing the hypocrite" is hardly apposite.—ED. T. S.]

Where, Oh Where, Was His God?

ELY, IA., April 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: That Freethought is above any church falsity cannot be denied by anyone who has common sense. In a debate with a Lutheran fanatic the other day I told him that I practiced more human love toward my fellow-man than he did, which he admitted by saying that he thought more of the Infidel than he did of a man who did not believe in some religion; even the devil was preferable to the Catholic. I told him that the Catholic thinks the same of him, and while I did not believe in any religion or hereafter, I made no difference between Catholic and Protestant as long as they were good neighbors and honest men.

I was told that Colonel Ingersoll speaks for the money, not for Freethought. Now suppose he does speak for money, don't he also speak for equal rights and equal liberty? On the other hand, what do the ministers speak for? Is it not the money? Don't they make money on the day that they call holy? Don't they take the last dollar out of the poor man's pocket, and let the children starve? Don't they say, Stop working on this day and bring me what you made during the week or be damned? Don't Catholics say, Do not associate with Protestants; have nothing to do with them, and vice versa? I wish we had about ten Ingersolls to every state in the Union, but it will not be long before we have that number.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 13th I saw a letter from Ben Ellis about Rev. Mr. Bothwell, who swallowed a cork and died in a few days in spite of all prayer. Here in Cedar Rapids Rev. Mr. Touchen took sick and refused a doctor, saying that faith in God would save him. A number of people knelt around his bed for several days and prayed. One morning a Freethinking neighbor came to visit him and found the reverend dead, and those praying not knowing that he had passed away some hours before. Was God with them?

As one of my neighbors and myself became subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER by receiving sample copies of same, I wish you would send specimen copies to the inclosed list of names.

My "Pictorial Text-Books" and "Old Testament Stories Illustrated" are doing good work among my neighbors. Will buy more books soon. J. C. DVORAK.

A Splendid Rebuke to Bigotry.

AMESBURY, MASS., April 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Last year a member of the School Committee of the town of Salisbury, Mass., engaged a Miss Cavannah to teach one of the primary schools. Two days after she took charge of the school two other members of the committee, who are friends of the A. P. A., called on the young lady and asked her if she was a Catholic. On being informed that such was the fact, she was told that she must immediately quit the school. The young teacher protested that she had not taught religion in the school, and did not intend to; that she was willing to meet the parents of the pupils at the school-house and explain her position, and if they then objected to her she would resign. Mr. Greely, by whom she was engaged, advised her to continue teaching, but one of the others declared that she should not teach another day, and if she attempted to he would blow up the building. He declared that the people in that district would not send their children to a school taught by a Catholic, whether she taught religion or not.

At the annual town meeting, which took place recently, the matter was brought before the people and among remarks made by different citizens were the following by J. A. Wilson, a TRUTH SEEKER subscriber: "Mr. Moderator: This teacher was hired on trial. Did she have a trial? Everyone in the town knows that she did not, but that she was discharged simply because she was a Catholic, which is not a sufficient cause. A teacher's religious belief has no connection with her fitness to teach a secular school. The member of the School Committee insulted Miss Cavannah when he demanded of her to disclose her religious belief to him. If the people of that district refuse to send their children to a school taught by a Catholic, why may not I refuse to send mine to the Plains school because it is taught by a Methodist? To me a Methodist is just as obnoxious as a Catholic. Neither is obnoxious so long as religion is kept out of the school. If this teacher is persecuted because she is a Catholic, where will our persecution end? One will refuse to send his children to a school taught by a Baptist; another to a school taught by an Episcopalian; another to one taught by an Infidel, and so on. In a land like ours, where there is, and probably always will be, such a wide diversity of opinion on religious matters, the only fair course to take is to make the public schools entirely secular; and this is what I demand. This is in no sense a Christian government, and the fact has been declared by its founders. The American republic was established on a secular basis, and it is a duty we owe to our ancestors, ourselves, and our posterity to preserve it as such. I ask you to be as fair to Catholics and Infidels as you would have them be to you if they were in the majority. I most earnestly protest against religious intolerance. It was the same spirit which kicked that school teacher out of her position and threatened to blow up the building with dynamite that ordered the Quakers to be lashed on their bare backs in every town from Dover to Providence; and I would like to see the same spirit here to-day that Robert Pike exhibited when he declared that such barbarism should not be practiced in Salisbury."

During Mr. Wilson's remarks several attempts were made to interrupt him, and the moderator finally declared that if the speaker was interrupted again he would order the disturbers from the hall. As the remarks were concluded the speaker was loudly applauded, which speaks well for the Liberal sentiment of this ancient town.

FREETHOUGHT.

Lecture Notes.

On Monday, April 14th, I was called to give an address at the funeral of Thomas J. Johnson, of Dwight, Ill., who died on Saturday, the 13th. Mr. Johnson was one of the best of Liberals, and a brave comrade has fallen. He was born in Connecticut; lived in Illinois forty years, and in Dwight ten years. By occupation a farmer, ill-health compelled him to abandon it, and for years he was a book and map agent, at which he was very successful. A wife and one child survive him. As a Free-thinker our friend was very outspoken and uncompromising. When he first moved to Dwight his radical views made him many enemies, until his sterling worth was discovered, and even Christians were bound to respect him. No man had more friends. A sketch of his life, prepared by a retired Methodist minister now living in Dwight, was given me to read. Nothing gave me more pleasure than to do so, for, from first to last, it was eulogistic of his noble character, even a clergyman being compelled to acknowledge the worth of an Infidel. His two brothers, John and Henry Johnson, are also Liberals. Mrs. Johnson and her daughter, Florence, Infidels to the core, were determined that the husband and father's wish to have a Freethought funeral should be respected. "After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well." Farewell, a long farewell.

We have in the city of Des Moines, Ia., a queer specimen in the person of the Rev. J. L. Sooy, D.D., who feeds the lambs of the first Methodist Episcopal church. The reverend is about six feet tall, slim, with furrowed cheeks, resembling in appearance, as well as in sentiment, the old Infidel hater, John Calvin. Mr. Sooy does not love the Infidels, though Christ commands him to love his enemies. When Colonel Ingersoll lectured in Des Moines last January, Sooy was thrown completely out of his normal condition. He went to hear the colonel, and the next Sunday told his congregation that immediately upon arriving home he took a bath, and hoped that all decent people who heard the lecture had done the same. If the necessity for the bath was as great as the occasion, what must have been the reverend D.D.'s condition! Determined to make a stand for Christ, he said that he had written letters to business men of Des Moines asking them whether they would, under any considerations, employ a young man who was an unbeliever in the Bible. Seventeen answers were received, fourteen of which replied that they would not employ an unbeliever. The reverend was delighted. It was telegraphed over the country that no Infidel could get a situation in Des Moines. According to this Methodist sky-pilot, all Infidels must starve. No one doubts that fourteen Christian bigots might be found who would say that they would not employ an Infidel. But there are about four hundred business men in this city. The reverend did not tell how many letters he mailed, whom he mailed them to, or who sent in the answers. Either he was ashamed of it, or the recipients of his communications were. This is a priestly trick, keeping back names so that an investigation cannot be made. When old "Parson" Brownlow said that the meanest men in the South were the Methodist and Baptist preachers, he should have added, "In the North, also."

Soon the tables were turned. A short time after Sooy's bold stroke, Dr. E. C. Spinney, secretary of the Iowa Building and Loan Association, got into trouble. Dr. Spinney had been a Baptist preacher, and a professor in Baptist colleges. Though leaving the ministry for secular pursuits, he still clung to the faith and retained his ministerial title of "doctor." I have seen him roll his eyes in the house of God with as much grace as though he had been in regular practice all the time. Mr. Sooy had now better write to the business men for their opinion of retired sky-pilots who leave the ministry for other employment, though remaining in the faith.

I am soon to start on a trip into the Dakotas, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. I have engagements in Hoople and Lakota in North Dakota; Pierson, Ia.; Red Jacket, Mich., and Greenwood and Omega in Wisconsin. I hope Liberals wanting lectures will not delay to write me at once to Box 882, Des Moines, Ia. In August I am open for engagements in Michigan, Northern Illinois, and in Canada.

Four Score and Seven.

WATERLOO, OR., March 30, 1895

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find fifty cents for the works named.

As this is my first communication to your office, I wish it to be my introduction. I was born in Ohio, in the year 1808, of earnest, sincere Methodist parents, who brought me up in the faith of that church, and when I grew to manhood I was a Methodist. Our small library was supplied with the Bible, hymn-book, and other Methodist reading, all instilling into my mind the thought that the Bible was wholly an inspired book, given to us as our guide through life, and it was a sin for us to call in question the truth of any portion of it. In this faith I lived until the sect at their own suggestion gave me a license to talk to the people; then it became my duty to read the Bible with all possible care, so that I should be able to teach the doctrine it contained. Engaging in this examination of the Bible I soon found passages that came in conflict with each other and with the discipline of the church to which I belonged, which gave me great mental trouble, so much so that I returned my license to the presiding elder of the church, saying to him: "I have no further use for that, as I cannot understand the Bible to be wholly an inspired book, as the church expects me to teach that it is." For a year or two I was, as theologians would say, adrift in the world as to what was the correct religious faith. While in that state of mind, Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" came into my hands and I read it with great care. This in some measure removed the anxiety of my mind; and I wish to say right here that but few people who have been raised under strict sectarian principles realize the difficulty they will have in laying them aside and receiving in their place well-established truth. The decided sectarian will be satisfied with almost any statement that is in harmony with his early training, but present to his mind any evidence to the contrary, and he will use all possible ways to evade its force. Consequently, the sectarians who control our schools obtain a great advantage in favor of sectarianism. Therefore, sectarian principles should be excluded from the schools, in order to do justice to the pupils and the patrons of the schools, and being satisfied of this fact, I in my old age have come to the conclusion that no remedy can be found until the contents of the Bible are more generally understood; and to that end I call for the portions of the Bible that the sects do not teach. I hold that no jury can give a true verdict until all the evidence is before them. In our courts the witness who in giving testimony plainly contradicts himself has his evidence thrown out. I do not wish to convey the idea that the Bible is wholly good or bad, but it should be judged as other books are, by good, sound human reason. If man possesses the power of reasoning, and it is the gift of creative power, it must have been given for him to use, and in that case there should be no conflict between revelation, so called, and human reason; and where there is the alleged revelation should be laid aside. If there ever was an open door of revelation between the people of our world and the inhabitants of the spirit-world or state, what has closed it? Is there not need of a better understanding of what they claim to be divine truth, among the various sects, than now exists? Would it not add to human happiness if harmony and brotherly love existed among them? Does not the testimony of modern Spiritualism accord more with humane reason than much that is found in what is called the holy Bible?

JAMES S. VINSON.

Where Is the Break?

HEIDELBERG, GERMANY, April 8, 1895.

GEO. E. MACDONALD, ESQ., OF THE TRUTH SEEKER—Dear G. E. M.: The Teutons here have an antiquated adage: "Schuster, bleib bei deinem Leisten" (Cobbler, stick to your last), but as I have no lasting veneration for lasting things—nor for everlasting ones—I have everlastingly disregarded this lasting apothegm (this last vocable—and this is from Webster last unabridged)—and as variety is the spice of life, and this our last chance, according to my last convictions, I have occasionally put aside my "last" and, instead, picked up my pen and used my best efforts and last minute to fight to the last that lasting monster, superstition.

Well, as you well know (and once broadly hinted—and which I have laid up against you to my last—I am no nomenclaturist (this is original), but my only "last"—the last term used here in the sense of my first and last vocation—is "Spindel-schmieren" (as the last German dubs the work of the poor horologer), from the original watches invented in the last year of the fifteenth century (lastly defined: 1500 A.D.) in Nuernberg, Germany—the last home of Hans Sachs, the famous cobbler-poet, who stuck to his last to the last—and called "Nuernberger Eier" (eggs—the watches, not the last named knight of the last); from the fact that their shape resembled eggs—which were "Spindel Uhren" (verge watches), this last fact from the a priori fact (is this last phrase correct?) that their escapement ("ticker") consisted, first, of an escapement-wheel and lastly of a "verge," the last an axle—somewhat smaller than that of the Ferris-wheel—with two "pallets" attached in diversified angles, the last of which, as long as the cogencies and convolutions (is this correct?) of the last-named ticker lasted would move, firstly (if there is anything wrong about this everlasting sentence and the lasting repetition of parentheses, kindly note the same in its last analysis in your inimitable "Observations"); one way and, lastly, to the last, or as long as the potentialities imparted by the main-spring lasted. And lastly, please note the fact that the "ticking" never lasted longer than the cogencies embodied in the wound-up spring lasted; hence, en passant, and the last lastly (as the preacher said), how irrational it appears, even to the casual observer, to insist that when the cogencies embodied in the human form at last cease when it is at last disintegrated into its last elements, that its functions to the last could still outlast the last dissolution of the body to the last moment of eternity, which, alas! is everlasting! and—for last connection of this sentence see above: but my last is "Spindel schmieren"—lastly merchant, in which line I claim to be proficient, while as a contributor to the Liberal propaganda I freely confess to be but a novice and bungler.

Having now confessed that my profession is horology and not philosophy or linguistic lore (from "Roget's Thesaurus"—"entirely unnecessary to mention," I hear you think! This implies, or should so imply, I think, that by virtue of such confession, the form of my contributions should be exempt from the usual rigid methods of criticism, but should be applied to the substance only.

This explained, I beg permission to inquire, dear Gem (why put in the periods? The "sig" is entirely appropriate without them), where is the "break" in the following affirmation, rather sardonically commented upon in THE TRUTH SEEKER of 23d ult?

"To postulate eternal potencies eternally inactive, then suddenly becoming active, is infinitely more irrational than eternal potencies eternally active." What's wrong with this? I thought it was one of the best of the many thoughts I have published from time to time under the head of "Musings." Is it the form or the matter which has aroused your "risibilities?" Please arise again and explain, as especially in lucidity of expression I humbly acknowledge you are a gem (without the periods) of far "purer water" than I. In Heidelberg we have little of the latter in our composition!

Kindly permit me, then, to interpret the thoughts which to you seem abstruse: You see the God of the Jew, of the Christian, and all other gods for that matter, are (conceding for the sake of argument that such mythical beings were reality) "eternal potencies, eternally inactive," who, then, suddenly, 6,000 or 6,000,000 of years ago it matters not which—became active. (Creating and governing the universe and all nations and sects on this and all other worlds at the same time, after eternal inactivity, is certainly a big job.) Herbert Spencer's notion that the universe at one time evolved from (previously eternal dead) chaos, also implies eternal potencies, eternally inactive, which, then—presto change!—suddenly commenced, miraculously, their, or its, slow and silent and mindless process and march of evolution. All other notions of "beginnings," "first causes," "designs," "purposive potencies," "conscious cosmic energy," and kindred notions, all alike imply the same—an eternity of time prior to the postulated "beginning," prior to the design or before these "first causes" became causes or agencies to cause, create (or design) the universes. All imply the same and all are alike irrational—the greatest sage and biggest fool here meet—because, if the universe at any particular period of time, be that 6,000, 6,000,000 of years or 6,000,000,000, of "light-years" ago, had not existed in its vast aggregate and precisely in the same degree of perfection (imperfection comes nearer facts) as it exists now, it would never have so evolved. Because what all existing causes, potentialities, or gods could or would not evolve during the eternity prior to any or all apocryphal beginnings or creative acts, such causes would, of course, never cause. See? An eternity of time is ever sufficient time to produce at remotest special period of time in the past, whatever has been evolved or created at the present time. Hence a beginning of nature, a first world, sun or system, could never have existed, no more than a first second. All forms are but repetitions of like forms having evolved throughout the realms of boundless space during all the ages of beginningless time.

All theories of commencement of the universe imply glaring miracle, stupendous effects without causes, in so far that something that would or could not create or evolve a universe or mouse during eternity, would then suddenly—without cause—(because this "something," postulated as the first cause, embodied within itself, up to that imaginary period, all existing causes) create or commence to evolve all formal existence. It implies that all came from nothing or from a "divine being" without in the least reducing "his" corporality. It implies chance, eternal standstill prior to these putative beginnings, or, in case of a God, eternal inactivity, sleep, unconsciousness, absence of volition, etc., then suddenly without cause (because "he" was the only existing cause and all in all), radical change of mind, sentiment, aspirations, plans, and volition. He who was content in "his" infinit wisdom" to exist solitary and alone in boundless expanse in absolute idleness during all the cycles of ages constituting beginningless time—this "eternal potency, eternally inactive," suddenly without cause created from nothing the universe! Is that rational or are we compelled to the conclusion that the potentialities existing now have always existed and always have been operative as now?

The God hypothesis implies more: At one time radical change of mind, caprice, imperfection, error, either before or after the (imaginary) creative act—all destructive of the Theistic hypothesis.

The universe exists now. This self-evident fact proves beyond doubt—though it is an "inexpugnable" mystery—that it has so ever existed and very like as now; and so will always exist.

How? I am as ignorant concerning this as a child. I do not pretend to explain cosmic problems. All I insist upon is that all theories to explain them by postulating exterior and antecedent causes—"infinite spirits," "supernatural agencies," or "Gods," are childish and absurd. All greatly intensify the problem; the methods of a God are infinitely more mysterious than the operations of nature. Do not the mysteries of all first causes, their methods and origin, again stare us in the face? Let us be content and base our faith upon reality and fact.

I am, dear GEM, with love to the other GEM without the G—your humble and grateful servant and pupil in the line of linguistic lore—can you guide me in the line of logic and reason as well?

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Winsome Baby Bunn.

Brighter than the stars that rise
In the dusky evening skies,
Brighter than the Robin's wing,
Clearer than a woodland spring,
Are the eyes of Baby Bunn—
Winsome Baby Bunn.

Smile, mother, smile!
Thinking softly all the while
Of a tender, blissful day,
When the dark eyes so like these
Of the cherub on your knees
Stole your girlish heart away.
Rarest mischief they will do
When once old enough to steal
What their father stole from you.
Smile, mother, smile.

Winsome Baby Bunn
Milk-white lilies half unrolled
Set in calyxes of gold,
Cannot match his forehead fair,
With its rings of yellow hair.
Scarlet berry cleft in twain
By a wedge of pearly grain
Is the mouth of Baby Bunn.
Winsome Baby Bunn.

Weep, mother, weep!
For the little one asleep,
With his head against your breast,
Never in the coming years
Will he find so sweet a rest.
Oh, the brow of Baby Bunn!
Oh, the scarlet mouth of Bunn!
One must wear its crown of thorns,
Drink its cup of gall must one!
Though the trembling lips shall shrink
White with anguish at the drink,
And the temples sweat with pain
Drops of blood like purple rain.
Weep, mother, weep.

Winsome little Baby Bunn!
Not the seashell's palest tinge,
Not the daisy's rose-white fringe,
Not the softest, faintest glow
Of the sunset on the snow,
Is more beautiful or sweet
Than the wee pink hands and feet
Of the little Baby Bunn—
Winsome Baby Bunn.

Auntie Bright's Lectures.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.—II.

While they were thus discoursing, the owner of the camel met them. "Hav you seen a stray camel?" he asked.

"Was it a one-eyed camel?" asked Mirzir.

"Yes," answered the camel-driver.

"Was it crooked-breasted?" asked Rebiah.

"Yes."

"Had it oil on one side, honey on the other, and a woman on its back?" asked Ayaz.

"Yes," was the eager reply, "and now giv back my camel."

"We hav not seen your camel," said they all. Whereupon the camel-driver grew very angry and accused the brothers of dishonesty. Finally, it was agreed they should all proceed on their way to the ameer, and present the complicated case to him.

Arriving, and having obtained an audience, the camel-driver stated his case.

"These men," he declared, "hav found a camel which I lost, and they will not tell me where it is."

"How do you know that they found it?" asked the ameer.

"They correctly described it." He then related their questions when he first met them.

"We hav not seen his camel," said the brothers.

"Then how could you describe it?" asked the ameer.

"I noticed that the grass where the animal had been feeding was cropped only on one side of the way," said Mirzir, "hence I thought that the animal had but one eye."

"I saw the print of one of its forefeet was deep and the other was light," said Rebiah; "hence I inferred it was crooked-breasted."

"What sagacity and discernment!" exclaimed the ameer; "but pray, how did you know that the camel was loaded with honey and oil, and carried a woman on its back?"

"On one side of the path," said Ayaz, "there were flies on the ground, and on the other side, ants. Flies seek for honey, ants for oil. The rider in one place dismounted from her camel, and the prints of the feet were those of a woman." The judge commended them heartily for their discernment, and having dismissed the somewhat mollified camel-driver, asked the purpose of their journey thither. After explanation, their troubles were happily adjusted, so that the brothers lived long in peace, loudly praising their beloved ameer.

Auntie Bright arose and shook the folds of cotton, which she had been industriously knitting during her lecture. Madge and Walter arose also, with a sigh of satisfaction and regret.

"How interesting!" exclaimed Madge. "And they were logicians, to be sure. Do you know any more Eastern legends, auntie?"

"Not many," was the reply. "However, I may tell you more some other day."

Correspondence.

BERNICE, MONT., April 18, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw a letter in the Corner by Carrie Kubin asking help for the editor of the Little Freethinker (Mr. Graves). You will find inclosed fifty cents to give to Mr. Graves. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we are all Atheists—no god, no devil, no angels, no saints; all the heaven or all the hell is what we make. I am ten years old—hav lived in the country and never went to school, but will start to school this fall.

Yours respectfully, CHLOE SCOBEE.
[The money has been forwarded to Mr. Graves. Chloe must study hard when she goes to school and learn all she can. She writes very well for one who has had no school advantages, and we are sure she is a bright, good girl.—Ed. C. C.]

VALE, OR., April 12, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. I am eleven years old, and I hav three brothers and one sister. The baby is two years old, and is a cunning little thing. I take care of him, and he likes to run after the sheep. Papa has forty-seven head of sheep, and I hav two. Our school-house is two miles and a half from here. I study physiology, geography, history, arithmetic, and spelling, and I read in the fifth reader. Our teacher's name is Mr. Brooks. He gave us each a large and beautiful card, bordered with silk fringe, on the last day of school. We live nine miles from the nearest town. There is no church there.

My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and if any little girl would like to correspond with me I will gladly answer.

Your Liberal friend,
ETHEL VIOLA JOHNSON.

[Another shining jewel to our coronet of Liberal gems.—Ed. C. C.]

SILVERTON, OR., April 18, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: As my other letter escaped the waste basket, I will try to write another. My other letter was written from Arkansas, but since that time we hav come to Oregon and settled in Silverton, Marion county. There are a great many Secularists here, and we hav a very large Secular Sunday-school; and, best of all, we hav that talented lady, Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, to teach us and lecture for us every other Sunday. Mrs. Smith invited five little girls to spend a week at her home, Castle Kehm-on-the-Willamette, and I was one of them. Castle Kehm is such a lovely place! They hav wild flowers growing all over their yard. Their house is on the main-land, but their chicken-house and orchard are on an island. Every morning and evening we went over to the island with Mr. Smith to feed the chickens. We had many boat rides. Mrs. Smith also taught us how to write on the type-writer. I would like to tell all about my visit at Castle Kehm, but my letter is too long now. So I will close for this time. Yours affectionately, STELLA WALTERS.

[Stella is fortunate indeed to hav Mrs. Smith for a teacher and lecturer. And that visit to Castle Kehm-on-the-Willamette must hav been delightful, and will never be forgotten. We would be pleased to hav Stella write for the Corner a more extended description of the beautiful Castle on the romantic Willamette.—Ed. C. C.]

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., April 6, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I address this letter to you in the name of Freethought, and I know you to be an earnest worker in this cause, for I hav in my possession your two books, "Apples of Gold" and "Story Hour," and I think more of those than any books I hav. Although I hav never seen you, I call you my teacher, for I hav learned more from your books and writings in THE TRUTH SEEKER than from all the teachings I ever had at school.

I am seventeen years of age, and hav one sister, aged thirteen. My mother is an invalid; she is paralyzed and has not walked a step for thirteen years.

My sister spoke in a county contest last Thursday night and got second prize, a gold medal. She is going to speak in another contest in about two weeks, and in another county contest next August. And as we hav exhausted our supply of pieces to speak, I write to you to send us (if it would not be putting you to too much trouble) some good patriotic pieces and recitations, declamations and orations of any kind; and I would like very much to hav the piece entitled "Wearing Out the Carpet," which was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER once, but I lost it. And if you know of any good books containing recitations that you can recommend, I would like to know where to send for them. I am just starting out as a school-teacher and would be glad of any suggestions you would make.

Now the reason I hav written to you in this matter is this, I know you to be a competent judge of such things, and because, in this section of the country, we are the only infidels and it is impossible to get pieces that are devoid of superstition, and one does not like to speak what one does not believe. I inclose one dollar to pay you for your trouble, and if there are any expenses over that, when you write tell me how much it is and I will send it to you.

ELLA M. HUNTER.

[To be regarded as a teacher by so bright a young lady as Ella is a source of pride and pleasure. The material asked for has been forwarded, and if any of our readers has the piece, "Wearing Out the Carpet," and will forward it to Miss Hunter's address, it will be conferring a favor upon a worthy and intelligent reader of the Corner.—Ed. C. C.]

A TALE OF A HALO. By Morgan A. Robertson. Illustrated by A. Carey K. Jurist. Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. The Truth Seeker Company, New York.

If it were not for the author's intimation that this little volume of satiric verse has a serious intent, it might be taken simply as a clever, amusing, and somewhat profane "skit," having no other object than to make the unthinking laugh by a burlesque presentation of things generally held sacred. But Mr. Robertson seems to have drawn his inspiration from the A. P. A. movement, for we are distinctly informed that the satire is aimed at the Roman Catholic church, although whatever is offensive in the poem would seem to be about as offensive to orthodox Protestants as to Catholics. Briefly outlined, the poem narrates the exploits of Beelzebub in the heavenly city, who, bent on mischief, disguises himself as one of the redeemed, passes the gate by "bluffing" St. Peter, and, joining the heavenly host, fills their breasts with envy and discontent by exhibiting a halo of brightness far superior to any of those furnished from the heavenly storehouse. The fiend is detected and denounced by the Archangel Michael, whereupon he doffs his disguise, defies the angelic throng, and throws the whole heavenly city into turmoil and uproar. The tumult continues until St. Patrick arrives from Ireland, where he has been helping to celebrate his birthday. This renowned saint, bethinking himself of the efficacy of the sign of the cross in such emergencies, soon has the fiend subdued and submissive. The motif of the poem is shown in a brief confab which Beelzebub has with Michael, wherein the fiend maintains that the plan of salvation is a failure because there are many good men in hell, while heaven abounds with hypocrites and death-bed repenters.

"That's so," said the archangel, scratching his chin.
"For that is the way St. Peter got in."

Michael, indeed, has a grudge against St. Peter, and on one occasion, seeking for evidence that would bring about his removal from the office of doorkeeper, investigated his "record," with this result:

And so through the pages he carefully sought
For data sufficient to make a good case,
And found that the saint was an impious, base
And hardened old hypocrite up to his death;
And only, in fact, with his very last breath
Had gabbled the prayer which allowed him to dwell

For the future in Heaven instead of in Hell.
His end had been sad. He had stolen the pay
Of a soldier of Rome, and had gone on his way
Pursued by the soldier, who won in the race,
And dealt him a terrible blow with his mace,
Which brought him to earth with a broken backbone

(And thus had the soldier recovered his own.)
But Peter expressed his emotions in prayer
Interlarded with curses that blistered the air.
And the bystanders wagered some trifling amounts
As to which he would make up his mind to renounce—

His prayers or his curses; for this would foretell
Just where he was going to, Heaven or Hell.
But Peter was lucky; his last moment came
As he wound up a prayer and before he could frame

A new malediction; and Heaven rejoiced
With exulting great joy, and the glad tidings Voiced
That the sheep which was lost had returned to the fold:
While the soldier, who'd bet on it, doubled his gold.

As Peter is held in reverence by the whole Christian world, it is difficult to see how such a libel on the great Apostle can be taken simply as a hit at the Catholic church. Protestant, Greek, and Arminian would alike join in resenting it, were it worthy of being taken seriously. The poem, in fact, considered as a shaft aimed at a great religious body, is simply ridiculous; but at the same time it is lively and animated and exhibits a coarse but genuine humor that, in case the reader is not too much shocked at its irreverence, makes it both readable and entertaining.—Syracuse Herald.

Great Opportunity To Make Money!

I have had such splendid success that I can't help writing to you about it. I have not made less than $5, and some days from $15 to $25. I am really elated, and can't see why others do not go into the Dish Washer business at once. I have not canvassed any; sell all my washers at home. They give such good satisfaction that everyone sold, helps to sell many others. I believe in a year I can make a profit of Three Thousand Dollars, and attend to my regular business besides. When a Climax Dish washer can be bought for $5, every family wants one, and it is very easy selling what everybody wants to buy. For particulars, address the Climax Mfg. Co., Columbus, Ohio. I think any lady or gentleman, anywhere, can make from $5 to $10 a day. I would like to have your readers try this business, and let us know through your columns how they succeed.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

POPES AND THEIR DOINGS

ACCOUNT OF

Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God.

Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents

Not for Parsons.

An old chief gave his experience of Indian agents this way: "Spoke agent heap bad man, heap swear, steal half Injun blanket, Injun flour; spoke agent lovum Jesus, steal all."

ROBINSON: "There's a great deal of complaint about that entertainment for the church. They say five hundred tickets were sold, and the hall would hold only three hundred people." Mrs. Robinson: "Well, why didn't the others come early?" —Puck.

KENTUCKY Sunday-school superintendent (to pastor): "See here, I'm not going to teach this school any longer if I've got to leave my revolver at home. Only yesterday Colonel Kilgore wiped the floor with me because I contradicted his statement that Moses was found in a clothes basket at the second battle of Bull Run."

WHILE the House was in session Sunday night, which by legislative fiction was called part of Saturday, Mr. Broderick, of Kansas, strolled over to the seat of Mr. Bailey, of Texas, who has a great reputation as a parliamentarian. "Bailey," queried the Kansan, "do you suppose the Lillid Congress by calling this Saturday will be able to fool the Lord?" "I don't know," replied Mr. Bailey, doubtfully; "perhaps it will. It has fooled everybody else." —St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

AN Argus reporter heard something that was alike ludicrous and shocking Sunday night. It was just at the portal of a church as the congregation were coming out. Two nice looking young men were coming out breathing grand sentiments of piety and sound theology regarding the sermon they had just listened to. One of them slipped on a piece of ice, and his arms and legs flew around in eight or ten different directions at once. As soon as he recovered his equilibrium he ripped out: "J—C— (not John Collins), a little more and I'd have gone to h— sure." Then a deep and dark-blue silence fell on all the place. —Portland Argus.

OUR ABSURD AND OPPRESSIVE BLUE LAWS.

If I were a philosopher I might offer some reflections on and draw some deductions from certain perplexities that beset men of this city on Sunday, anent your editorial of yesterday. As, for instance, if I were a philosopher, I might ask myself where freedom of action ends and restraint begins.

On Sunday Mr. De Smythe is at liberty—if he is a member of an uptown club—to enter its reception-room, call for any beverage, vinous, malt, or spirituous, and have it brought to him with most perfumery elegance by a swallow-tailed waiter. But Mr. De Smythe is not permitted on that holy day to buy beer, wine, or liquor at a hotel or saloon bar.

On Sunday John Smith is free to go to the park or a garden and listen to the strains that issue from the kiosks, but he is restrained on that holy day from listening to instrumental music in a public hall. He may go to a concert in the evening, where gems from operas are sung by Melba, De Reszke, or Scalchi, but he cannot hear an opera in its entirety.

On Sunday he may take a pleasure trip on a steamboat or may witness a swimming match, but he is debarred from seeing athletes bat at a baseball. On Sunday he may buy a cigar, but it is made a crime to sell him a pair of gloves or an umbrella. On Sunday he may drive with considerable rapidity on the Boulevard, but he may not witness a race.

On Sunday Mr. De Smythe's coachman is permitted to drive him to the church door and wait on the box till the service is over, and after that may drive him to his club, where he gets his dinner and his bottle of '64 Hochheimer; but the coachman may not take either wife or sweetheart on Sunday to a grove where there are music and beer, Hochheimer, or anything but plain Crotonheimer.

On Sunday he may buy a good dinner either at his club or at a hotel, but the grocers are forbidden, under penalties, to sell him the wherewithal to make a Sunday dinner at home.

On Sunday De Smythe may be shaved by the obsequious Figaro at his club-rooms, but it is now contemplated that this necessity shall be denied to plain John Smith at the hair-dressing rooms throughout the city.

On Sunday he may look at the panorama in Twenty-fourth street, but the sight of a pantomime in Fourteenth street is debarred him.

On Sunday he may hear the blare of trumpets and the music of Cappa's band at the head of a funeral parade, but itinerant musicians with the best of intentions and wind are not allowed to play for him on this same Sunday.

Strange, isn't it?

And if I were a philosopher I might descant on the howness of the why, but as I am not I simply state the facts.—Wm. Geo. Oppenheim, in New York World.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STEOK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

Gems of Thought.

To pray is to flatter oneself that one will change entire nature with words. — Voltaire.

No virtue has ever been found to flow from the theological studies of the church. — David Swing.

Most people dread far more the social frown which follows the doing of something conventionally wrong, than they do the qualms of conscience which follow the doing of something intrinsically wrong. — Herbert Spencer.

MILITARY training incites to military methods, just as pugilistic training incites to pugilism. It nurses the brutish propensities. Yet we have educators who advocate the military for the schools and colleges of the republic. — Progressive Age.

GREAT struggles are before us; great contests for the right. Liberty is not yet achieved. Truth is not yet on the throne. The press and platform must take the place of sword and cannon in still mightier combats in the arena of the world. — Samuel P. Putnam.

A POLITICAL victory, a rise of rents, the recovery of your sick or the return of your absent friend or some other quite external event raises your spirits, and you think good days are preparing for you. Do not believe it. It can never be so. Nothing can bring you peace but the triumph of principles. — R. W. Emerson.

And then the woman, thus taught by her lords, has begun to retort in these latter days by endeavoring to enslave the man in return. Unable to conceive the bare idea of freedom for both sexes alike, she seeks equality in an equal slavery. That she will never achieve. The future is to be free. We have transcended serfdom. Women shall henceforth be the equals of men, not by leveling down, but by leveling up; not by fettering the man, but by elevating, emancipating, unshackling the woman. — Grant Allen.

ANY interruption of the commerce of liberty, so long as individuals do not trespass, is a blow at social harmony. It is not necessary that all men should talk sense, but is necessary that all should speak in the atmosphere of honesty and freedom. Do not put up more walls. Throw open the windows. Reduce the barriers. Give enemies a chance to shake hands. Invite thought into the open air. Do not drive it to subterranean chambers and caves. Nothing sacred was ever really defended by the sacrifice of oppression. — Horace L. Traubel.

A GREAT man adds to the sum of knowledge, extends the horizon of thought, releases souls from the Bastille of fear, crosses unknown and mysterious seas, gives new islands and new continents to the domain of thought, new constellations to the firmament of mind. A great man does not seek applause or place; he seeks for truth; he seeks the road to happiness, and what he ascertains he gives to others. A great man throws pearls before swine, and the swine are sometimes changed to men. If the great had always kept their pearls, vast multitudes would be barbarians now. A great man is a torch in the darkness, a beacon in superstition's night, an inspiration and a prophecy. — Ingersoll.

It is perfectly proper for an individual to resist aggression and to restrain a probable aggressor, and it is therefore right for him to unite with others to do these acts. But he has no right as an individual to interfere with actions of other non-aggressive persons. For this reason he can delegate no such right to any agent, whether called a government or anything else. Neither can one man have the right to compel others to be good, even supposing it were possible for him to do so. Where could he get any such right? Most people would recognize this fact in their personal conduct toward other individuals, and yet when it comes to matters of good government, would be found advocating all kinds of measures for the repression and punishment of vice. — E. D. Burleigh.

Not all the experiences of eternity could surpass the sublimity of one well-spent day. And this we have now within our grasp. Yes, but you desire the happiness by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

of a day to be repeated forever. Well, and suppose this prospect is denied you, or that you have no reasonable expectation of the fulfillment of your hope of immortality. Will you refuse to be righteous for one day, or one year, or seventy years? Is this loyalty to truth and morality? You will not be virtuous even for a day, because your everlasting existence is not guaranteed! From such mulish obstinacy and from such tainted ethics Rationalism turns with abhorrence. Whether it be for one brief revolution of the earth, or for unlimited ages, a vision of truth and beauty, and the opportunity and power to live with honor, are the greatest gifts that can bless the children of the universe. — *F. A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume. — [Freethinkers' Magazine].

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers. — [Boston Investigator].

In 1875 the sum paid by the United States government in pensions was $29,456,216; it was a little less in each of the succeeding three years, and from 1879 to 1893 it steadily augmented, in the latter year reaching the total of $159,357,557. In 1894 it fell slightly, being $141,177,284.

MAXIMO GOMEZ, the Cuban leader who took part in the last insurrection in that island, has recently succeeded in landing with some companions and will have command of the insurgent forces. The Spanish authorities tried to keep the news of his arrival from reaching the outside world, lest it should "stimulate the enthusiasm" of the friends of the insurgents in the United States and Central America.

RUSSIA, Germany, and France have formally protested to Japan against the permanent occupation of any portion of the Chinese mainland by Japan, as contemplated by the treaty of peace between the two Eastern countries. England and Italy are apparently inclined to remain neutral, although the former nation might, in certain contingencies, side with Japan. The Japanese government is between two fires, for if it relinquishes any of the advantages secured by the war and ratified by the treaty, its own people are likely to revolt, dissatisfied as a good many of them already are, the demands of the government on China having been altogether too moderate to suit the extremists. On the other hand, Russia is pretty certain to insist that she have a big slice of China if Japan retains the Liao Tung peninsula.

FOR damages amounting to $77,500 accruing from injuries inflicted upon British subjects, including a consular representative, in Nicaragua, English marines have occupied the port of Corinto. The Nicaraguan government has declared the port closed, and the town has been deserted by officials and people. The English intended to collect custom duties to the amount of damages and costs, but this action of the Nicaraguans will force them to occupy all the ports of the republic. The Nicaraguan government has temporarily baffled the English and at the same time placed the United States, evidently with very deliberate intent, in a most delicate position. By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and Great Britain, the latter nation cannot erect any fortification, or occupy, fortify, or colonize any part of Central America through which territory the ship canal may pass, and without doing this England has no chance to collect her admittedly just claim against Nicaragua. On the representations of the government of the United States England had agreed that Nicaragua should have more time to pay the debt, but as the Nicaraguan government would not concur in the arrangement the seizure of Corinto was necessitated. The London Graphic points out that "President Jackson in 1834 laid down that it was a well settled principle where one nation owed another a debt which it neglected to pay, that the creditor nation might seize sufficient property belonging to the debtor nation or its subjects without giving just cause for war."

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the few of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

HOW THE STUPID OLD BIRD IS PLUCKED OF HER PLUMAGE.

Something a Little Extra for Truth Seeker Readers.

For a good many years Mr. Samuel Porter Putnam's "News and Notes" have been a feature of THE TRUTH SEEKER very greatly admired by its readers. Their diversity and versatility and poetically descriptive qualities have been universally admired and imitated—but never copied with success.

As President of all the nationally-organized Freethought of this country, Mr. Putnam on April 24th started on a visit to the Freethinkers of England. Officially and privately he will undoubtedly have a grand reception. England is a great country in a small space, with a big history, in which Freethought has played and is playing a conspicuous part.

While he is gone Mr. Putnam will be duly commissioned as correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will write for the benefit of our readers the generals and particulars of his trip. Every English Freethinker in this country will want to read this account. It will do him good. Every American Freethinker will find these letters by Mr. Putnam vastly entertaining, instructive, poetic, and good reading.

New subscriptions for this event should begin now and run for six months. A three months' trial trip will just get you into the middle of them, but if you can't do better take that, for we know you will renew. Ask any reader of Mr. Putnam's "News and Notes" if they are not worth the cost of a whole year's subscription, and if he does not say YES, we will refund the subscription you send.

An Overzealous Peace Officer.

Hillsboro is the county seat of Traill county, North Dakota. A short time since the Herald of that city contained this local news item:

"Deputy Sheriff Gaustad evidently thinks that it will do criminals good to come in closer relation with religion. Last Sunday he handed a Bible to each of his two prisoners and asked them to read. They took it for a joke and refused, but they changed their mind when Mr. Gaustad told them that they must read a chapter each, or there would be no dinner in sight. The two sinners had to stand it, and two chapters of the good book were read (perhaps for the first time in that jail) with solemnity. Mr. Gaustad says he will keep it up—Bible reading on Sunday or no dinner. He has expected the ministers to attend to that part, but as no ministers show up, he has decided to take it in his own hands."

Deputy Gaustad would delight the heart of Governor Greenhalge of Massachusetts or ex-Governor Pattison of Pennsylvania. He undoubtedly believes in the dictum that Christianity is part of the law of the state. If he remains a peace officer of Traill county it will be because the Freethinkers of that county are few and feeble. He should be bounced so unceremoniously that he will feel for a year as though he were suffering from a very severe attack of mal de mer. In Article XVI. of the constitution of North Dakota we find this:

"The following article shall be irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of this state:

"Section 203. First, perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of this state shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship."

Starving a man because he refuses to read the Bible is undeniably a molestation of his person on account of his mode of worship, and hence the act of Deputy Gaustad is clearly unconstitutional as well as bigoted and cruel. Compelling occupants of jails to read the Bible or go without their meals is as illegal and invasiv and theocratic as is the forcing of pupils in the common schools to lay aside their books while the teacher reads the Bible and prays. Both acts are rank usurpations.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses or to one, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

A Discouraged Assistant Bishop.

The Right Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., Assistant Bishop of Tennessee, lectured recently in this city under the auspices of the Church Club. He said that it was depressing to visit a town of 1,800 inhabitants, where perhaps five hundred persons attend church, and to find ten or twelve churches bidding for the patronage of these five hundred, and all so poor that they can not afford a resident minister. "This," said the bishop, "is getting to be a not uncommon ecclesiastical condition in many Eastern and Southern towns." But the good man omitted to point out that all these superfluous churches are untaxed, and hence a burden upon the non-churchgoers.

"Sixty-eight per cent of the population of the United States are reported as without any religious affiliation whatever. And infidelity, the infidelity that represents intellectual skepticism, and the infidelity that represents spiritual indifference or despair, and the infidelity that represents moral failure—infidelity is every day more aggressiv and widespread."

In the spirit of the most compassionate kindness we would advise Bishop Gailor not to make too prominent that "infidelity that represents moral failure," lest some unkind critic should call attention to the criminality that develops in the Christian ministry, to the records of the prisons of the country, to the fact that the most criminal element in India, in proportion to its numbers, is the European, to the scandalously long list of Christian cashiers and bank presidents who hav betrayed their trusts and devoured the life's savings of the poor and the patrimony of widows and orphans. But even if it were admitted—which it is not—that Infidels are no more respectful of the rights of their neighbors than are Christians, the reverend gentleman from Tennessee should bear in mind the fact that Christianity has had the moral training of all the people of this country and their ancestors under its direction for centuries.

But in other directions the bishop is telling fearful tales out of school. Listen to him for a moment:

"The divinity of Jesus Christ, the atonement, the value of the sacraments, the nature and destiny of man, the nature of God, the inspiration and contents of the Bible, the form and purpose of public worship—each and all of these great themes are subjects of fierce and intolerant dissension. There are those who use musical instruments and those who do not; those who sing hymns and those who sing psalms. . . . The chill of uncertainty affects our missionary work at home and abroad. The Chinese write articles to our own reviews demanding to know why we ask the Chinese to become Christians when we ourselves seem to be unable to determin what Christianity is. But more than this, our seemingly utter inability to agree together on any rational statement of the Christian doctrine has led many men and women to the conclusion that after all the Christian gospel is not a definit message of help and blessing to mankind, but that it is a force or influence vague and indefinit."

Is it not wonderful that sensible Christians—that is, sensible in matters not connected with religion—do not see that if a god had designed that they and the rest of the people of the world should be saved through the understanding and acceptance of a revelation from him, he would hav made it so clear and plain that there would not hav been any doubt concerning the terms upon which eternal salvation was to be obtained and eternal death escaped by the children of men? Would a good and wise God hav given the world such a record of his will that after it had been in the possession of the church for nearly nineteen hundred years his own representatives, as they esteem and style themselves, would be compelled to confess that they seem utterly unable "to agree on any rational statement of the Christian doctrine"? In view of the indisputable facts cited by Bishop Gailor, must not the thinking, honest Christian confess either that there is no warrant for the belief in the inspiration of the Bible or that the God back of it is not all-good or all-wise? Is there any rational escape from this dilemma? No, but Mr. Gailor still looks for one through the inverted telescope of Hope:

"I cannot believe that the reunion of Christendom is a mere iridescent or spangled dream. I cannot but believe that the words of our Lord and the faith of the apostles are a standing rebuke to such skepticism. The triumphs of the early church are a warning and a prophecy, and he who taught us to pray 'Thy kingdom come' will fulfil himself, though men doubt and fall."

What touching simplicity! Has the bishop forgotten that concerning "the words of our Lord" there is wide disagreement within the churches, not only as to what they are but as to what they mean? Did Jesus even expect that there would be an assistant bishop of Tennessee? If the Bible is to be relied on, did he not say to his disciples:

"For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works."

Is this the establishment of the kingdom of God for which Mr. Gailor hopes? But when was this kingdom to be set up, according to Jesus, who was "very God," if the creeds are to be believed? He tells us in the verse following the one just quoted (Mat. xvi, 27, 28).

"Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here, which shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom."

Was Jesus a true prophet or was he not, and if he was not, was he God or the son of God? Has Bishop Gailor any facts for our consideration?

Church Aggressions.

Are Sunday laws in the interest of the church, or for the securing of a day of rest for the worker? At the Greensburg, Pa., Sabbath convention Albert H. Bell delivered an address on the Sunday newspaper. Discoursing of the Pennsylvania Sabbath law of 1794, he said:

"It has been most beneficent in its results. It has helped to keep our state distinctively Christian. It has promoted the spread of the gospel."

Who will say that Sunday legislation is not religious legislation? Mr. Bell is a lawyer, we believe, and so he hunted up and gave his auditors a partial list of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania affirming the constitutionality of the Sabbath law of 1794. In 1817 the law was sustained in the case of a Hebrew barber who contended that Saturday was the true Sabbath and that the Sunday law was unconstitutional because it conflicted with his religious convictions. In 1848 and 1880 it was sustained against Seventh-Day Baptists. In the last of these cases the court declared that the law was settled, and no longer open to argument. In 1890 the law was sustained in a case that came up from Washington county. In 1893 a case came to the Supreme Court from Pittsburg, where a newsdealer had kept his place open for the sale of Sunday papers, justifying it under the act of 1794 as a necessity.

"The Supreme Court said that it was not a necessity, but at most a convenience, and at the same time commended the law as a wise and just one. Other cases to the same purpose are: Granger's appeal, 7 Phila. 355, closing public library on Sabbath; 2 Grant 508, running cars for hire; Johnson vs. Com., 22 Pa. Rep. 102, running an omnibus; Scully vs. Com., 85 Pa., 511, piloting a canal boat."

And yet in the face of all these decisions, Mr. Bell is under the necessity of telling us that, whereas there was not a Sunday paper in Pittsburg a dozen years ago, now four of the seven dailies get out Sunday editions with a circulation of 140,000 copies, and that in a portion of the state containing a reading population of 2,000,000 these Sunday desecrators are no longer regarded as outlaws, but as welcome visitors, as public benefactors. This suggests something concerning the relative strength of a reactionary church supported by a fossil court and the forces of modern progress. But such laws are always dangerous, for, while they cannot be enforced against wealthy newspapers, they remain a menace to the poor and unpopular, and the disregard of them by the powerful inevitably tends to bring into contempt laws that really protect the rights of the citizen. Yet it is far better that they should be defied by some than that they should be enforced against all, for that defiance helps educate the people to better things. Anything is better than tame submission to church-dictated law.

The court denies the necessity of certain kinds of Sunday work. What right has it to say how much or how little work is a necessity for the individual citizen? It has not a particle of right to a voice in the matter. As ex-Senator Wm. P. Tolley says regarding the related question of "rest," in his petition to the legislature of Tennessee to repeal the odious Sunday law of that state, "if . . . physical rest is the end to be obtained, what safer tribunal to settle when and how much a citizen should rest can there be than himself? If he is capable of regulating and controlling any of his private affairs, to say nothing of his capacity to play a part in the public affairs of his country, indeed the chief part, as the law supposes, for in him resides all sovereignty under our system, then indeed it may well be left to him to rest only when he chooses. No one else can know so well as he when he is tired and how much rest he requires to refresh himself." Most true. Let the churches and courts attend to their legitimate business and leave the people free to work out their own salvation, temporal and spiritual.

In Lewiston, Mich., Dr. Traver had James Wilson arrested for shaving his customers on Sunday. The jury acquitted the prisoner. On the other hand, West Bay City, in the same state, has a new ordinance which prohibits business or labor of any kind on Sunday, and also participation in or attendance upon any kind of entertainment, sport, or game, under penalty of fine or imprisonment. In Lynn, Mass., it has long been customary for the yachtsmen to paint their yachts on Sunday, but this year the police, at the instigation of the pietists, of course, forbade the work. There is great excitement in consequence, but it remains to be seen whether the yachtsmen will have the nerve and sense to vote against the legislators who enacted the new Sunday law in that state and lead the way in sending to Boston next year men who will repeal that and the more ancient relics of barbarism remaining on the statute books, and give poor old moribund Massachusetts a chance to march up into the nineteenth century.

In California the Barbers' Protective Union is disposed to exult over the adoption of a new Sunday law in that state, a law which is intended to close all shops at noon on Sunday. The Barbers' Protective Union is an association of barbers who do not want to work on Sunday themselves, and who are determined that the barbers who do shall not have the opportunity. It is the old story of the dog in the manger. The barbers who do not wish to work on that day have a perfect right to abstain, as they have to abstain on any other day, but their right to do so is no greater than the right of those who wish to work on Sunday is to work, nor the right of those who desire to be shaved or have their hair cut on that day is to get those services performed. Have the American people gone mad? Have they forgotten the first principles of equal liberty, or did they never know them?

The New York Tribune, in its issue of April 21, has this editorial:

"To those who clamor so loudly for the repeal of our Sunday observance laws, which they denounce as an anachronistic survival of old Puritan days, the report just issued by the Sabbath League Association of France should serve as a lesson. From the days of Emperor Charlemagne down to 1880 statutes had figured in the French codes prohibiting under severe penalties labor of every kind on Sundays, and even the Revolutionary government of a hundred years ago, which substituted the worship of the Goddess of Reason in the place of Christianity, made a point of prescribing by law one day of rest in the week. Fifteen years ago the Freethinking element in the National Legislature succeeded in obtaining the repeal of all legislation in connection with the matter, declaring it no longer in keeping with the enlightened and liberal spirit of the present age. Yet today, as shown elsewhere in our columns, these self-same men figure prominently in the ranks of that Sabbath League, which has been formed with the object of securing the reenactment of the laws providing for the observance of Sunday. The experience of the last fifteen years has furnished to them, as well as to the many eminent statesmen, politicians, and economists of every shade and creed who belong to the association, adequate proof that the removal of these statutes from the code was a mistake, and that a legal day of rest in a week is a necessity to every people, be it infidel or Christian."

While Mr. Whitelaw Reid has his attention attracted to this subject he might tell the world how it happens that this "League" chances to be a Sabbath league if its purpose is to secure nothing more than a weekly day of rest for the wage-worker. If it is only for the purpose of securing a day of rest, why is the idea of a sacred Sabbath imported into the name of the society? Why should "Freethinkers" "figure prominently" in a movement which can have no other effect, if successful, than to give legal recognition and authority to the religious dogma of holy days? What is the use of talking about the "observance" of Sunday if all that is sought is a secular day of rest? Why should there be a demand for a sweeping law of Sunday observance when the ostensible object of the League is to prevent involuntary labor only? What more can possibly be needed in the way of statutes than a provision that employers shall not require their work-people to labor more than six days out of seven, leaving to employers and employees absolute freedom to arrange among themselves all details pertaining to the weekly rest? In France no more than in the United States, and in the United States no more than in France, is it possible or desirable to suspend all work on Sunday or any other day. It is impossible for the majority to get the benefit of their holiday unless the minority work. There are people enough to do the work without overworking any one, and there is not the slightest necessity for laws denying any person's right to work. All this talk concerning the alleged necessity for a legal day of idleness for everybody is mischievous nonsense. It is inspired by priests and not by intelligent working people, for the latter clearly see the game of the church, and they also know that somebody must work when a good many play. Let the people rest, but rest when they want to rest, not compel them to rest when it is to the interest of the priest that no shop-door but his own shall be open, or when their rivals in trade say they ought to rest.

It may be remarked in passing that the Tribune's fling at the "worship of the Goddess of Reason" is unworthy of a paper which has valid claims to dignity and scholarship.

A bill is pending in the Pennsylvania House to legalize advertising in Sunday papers, and another to reduce the fine for violation of the Sabbath law from $25 to $4. Of course the Pittsburgh and Allegheny Presbyterians are bitterly opposed to the bill, and they sent a committee, consisting of Reverends George, McMillan, and McCrory, and Mr. Hugh Morrison, to Harrisburg to present arguments to the committee of the legislature having the measure in charge. There they were joined by a committee from Philadelphia, and Dr. McCarrell from the Cumberland Valley. Mr. George said to the committee:

"It would be an improper use of the funds of Christian people to pay for advertisements in a Sunday newspaper. The legislature would have no right to take money paid in taxes by Christian citizens and expend it for that which violated the consciences of citizens."

The Christian Statesman says that this allusion to conscience seemed to be met with a sneer. It would not be surprising if it were. Such an argument from the lips of Dr. H. H. George is enough to provoke the most tolerant of mortals to sneers and jibes. Does this Covenanter ever think of the rights of conscience when he demands that money paid in taxes by Freethinkers, Jews, and Catholics be used to teach Protestantism in the public schools to the children of those classes? What does he care for conscience rights when he clamors for the employment of salaried chaplains by the state and national governments? Is it tender solicitude for the rights of conscience of his heretical neighbors that leads him to urge in season and out of season that they be compelled to observe his holy day? His love of conscience rights is plainly manifested in his endeavors to secure such an amendment to the national Constitution as will forever prevent non-Christians from holding office and will permit the direct appropriation of public money for the propagation of religion. Dr. George and his associates are the last men to talk of the rights of conscience. No wonder that the committee was suspected of sneering, and that it gave them scant courtesy, according to their report of the proceedings.

Dr. McCrory said that if the law were repealed nine out of ten of the barbers in Pittsburgh would be at work within thirty days. From this it would appear that only a fraction of the barbers favor the law, but that one-tenth of them, backed by the priests, are able to dictate to the nine-tenths and to the people who would patronize them if the shops were open on Sunday. The Christian Statesman repudiates the idea that the wishes of the people should rule in the matter of what should be accessible on Sunday, saying that the principle "that works of necessity and charity should determine what should be allowable on the Lord's day" must dominate. This means that the Sabbatarians are to decide what is necessary, not the people immediately interested.

The Covenanter committee report that the Senate bill to permit the printing and sale of Sunday newspapers, which was referred to the Committee on Vice and Immorality (think of the insult implied in sending such a bill to such a committee!) will be killed. The church is aroused all over the state and desperate efforts are being made to kill all three of the bills. We have not heard that the Liberal people of the state have taken any action on the other side. It was Horace Greeley's conclusion that the children of darkness were always practically wiser than the children of light.

"Colonel Ingersoll gets a large amount of applause, but the mourners' bench doesn't seem to fill as it does at a revival service."—Detroit Evening News.

But what the church gains at the mourners' bench the business world loses, as witness the steady stream of pious cashiers on their way to Canada with heavy grips.

Anthony Comstock recently had one Serafo Arteaga arrested as the owner of phonograph, through which it is alleged that he circulated "indecent, profane, and sacrilegious speeches." It would be interesting and probably instructive to have Comstock's definition of "profane and sacrilegious speeches." Where is this legal suppression of alleged irreligious matter to end? Would not THE TRUTH SEEKER be "profane and sacrilegious" in the estimation of such men as Comstock and his assistant, "Agent Oram," who arrested Arteaga?

The Dayton (Tenn.) Republican hits the nail squarely on the head with a very heavy hammer when it tersely says that "there is not a Sunday keeper in Rhea county who would not feel that his religious liberty was infringed if he were compelled to keep Saturday." And it is necessary to add that the Sundayites would raise a rebellion at once if they were asked to submit to a law requiring such observance. But the wrong done to them under such circumstances would be no greater than is the wrong now inflicted upon all non-Sundayites who are compelled by law to observe Sunday.

During the argument of Dr. McMillan, of Philadelphia, before the committee of the Pennsylvania legislature (on the Sunday question), he was told by Committeeman Fow that he sold papers in the Sunday-school of his own church; that the little daughters of the committeeman had bought them there. Another Covenanter interjected that there "was no use wrangling about such little points." Didn't Mr. Fow know that it was only a "little point" to prove a Sabbatarian guilty of playing the hypocrit? Does he not understand that the Sundayites object to Sunday work and recreation only in so far as they interfere with the church monopoly of Sunday? It is only a "little" thing to sell innocent children the pernicious trash known as the Sunday-school paper on that day, but it is the vilest of vile sins to print and sell the Sunday newspaper in the same period of time.

The Archbishop of Canterbury follows in the footsteps of Pope Leo in pleading for the reunion of Christendom. In a pastoral letter addressed to his arch-diocese, asking members of the Church of England to offer prayers on Whit-Sunday for unity, the primate says:

"When we consider the terrible separation of the past, when we now see so many communions—Presbyterian, Nonconformist, and Roman Catholic—at home and abroad in America, we are moved to desire to seek Christian unity. Who can doubt that this change is of the Lord?"

History shows us that while Christian unity—or the desire for it—may be "of the Lord," the thing itself and the struggle for it have always raised the other gentleman. We fervently hope that the present efforts of the church in that direction may be confined to prayers; in which event the attempt is foredoomed to failure.

The subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER is enjoying a little boom from our large premium offer, and we want to see that boom swell and expand and grow until our list goes up into the tens of thousands, where it ought to be. And having this great offer to help them, we think our friends can send it there with scarcely an effort. We have never before been able to give them so good a chance, and we hope they will feel encouraged to do their best for Freethought and THE TRUTH SEEKER, for every copy of the paper and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" put into new hands is an incalculable power for good and will help to dethrone ecclesiastical tyranny. Cannot every reader send us at least one new yearly subscriber, and thus secure for himself or the new subscriber, as he may direct, the powerful work offered as a premium? Remember, we have sold five thousand copies of this book at $2 each, and without an exception every one who purchased it has been more than pleased and satisfied.

Rev. Dr. Marcus L. Taft, late of Pekin, talked about the Chinese-Japanese war the other day. Speaking of the treatment of native Christians in China, he narrated the story of one who was tortured by having ice-cold water thrown over him as he lay naked in a prison cell. This was done, says Mr. Taft, "because he believed in the true God." Could anything be more childish and tribal than that? This Chinese Christian was tortured because he believed in a god different from those worshiped by his compatriots, just as millions of "heathens" have been tortured and murdered by Christians because their gods were not the gods of the slaughterers. Let us suppose that the Chinese who had the cold water thrown on him had been a pervert from the popular religion of China to some religion other than the Christian—would Mr. Taft then have said that he was persecuted because he "believed in the true God"? Certainly not, because the god believed in by the victim would not be the god believed in by the preacher, and yet the motive for the torture would have been the same as in the case cited, that is, hatred of the religion espoused by the one persecuted.

The anti-slavery struggle has served as an analogy for about every apostle of despotism who has raised his head in this country since the close of the civil war. The Christian Reformer, arguing in favor of the proposed Christian amendment to the national Constitution, says:

"History is repeating itself. Christians were blind to the need of an anti-slavery amendment to our Constitution till the crisis came. Another crisis is coming and then Christians will see and act."

Slavery was the denial of physical liberty, and the amendments to the Constitution in which were crystallized the results of the war, legalized physical liberty for every inhabitant of the republic not convicted of crime. Christianity is the denial of mental liberty on all days and of physical liberty on Sunday, and the proposed Christian amendment would legalize this denial of mental and physical liberty. The attempted analogy is the sharpest of contrasts. As before the war, by the admission of the Christian Reformer itself, Christians were blind to the necessity for a righteous amendment to the Constitution, so now, three decades after the close of the war, the theocratic Christians are eager for an unrighteous amendment to the Constitution. They stand self-convicted of being on the wrong side of every great moral issue of the century.

Talmage wants his Christian brethren to be patient and gentle with the poor skeptic. He says that there is always some reason, good or bad, for the existence of skepticism. Goethe's irreligion, he tells us, started when news came to Germany of the earthquake at Lisbon, that, with the resulting overflow of the Tagus, destroyed sixty thousand lives. That shook the great poet's faith in the goodness of God, says the gentleman late of Brooklyn. Of course a trifle like that would not disturb the faith of Talmage, but with Goethe it was different, for he had a clear brain and warm sympathies. Other skeptics have become such because they were persistently asking, Why?

"There are so many things they cannot get explained. They cannot understand the Trinity or how God can be sovereign and yet man a free agent. Neither can I. They say: 'I don't understand why a good God should let sin come into the world.' Neither do I. You say: 'Why was that child started in life with such disadvantages, while others have physical and mental equipment?' I cannot tell. They get out of church on Easter morning and say: 'That doctrine of the resurrection confounded me.' So it is to me a mystery beyond unravelment."

Then the difference between Talmage the skeptic and the honest skeptic would appear to be that the latter does not pretend to accept as divine truths dogmas which are utterly incomprehensible to him, while Talmage makes a rich living preaching doctrines for which, by his own confession, he is utterly unable to find any foundation in nature or reason. The preacher is welcome to his opinion of himself.

"[It [the atonement] did the gravest injustice to the character of God, presenting him in the light of one who, regardless of misery, regardless even of justice, simply sought for some one on whom what in man would be called vengeance must be satiated. Our theology has grown more simple, more wise, more reverent, more scriptural. And the more recent view is vastly more effective, because it allies with it the moral nature of man. If penalty is inflicted by the fiat of God, man may find ground for complaint. He may say, not only, 'My punishment is greater than I can bear,' but 'My punishment is greater than I deserve.' But if his punishment is simply the direct result of his own life—if it is a part of his life—then, he must be speechless."—Examiner (Baptist).

He will be singularly lacking in intellectual perspective if he is "speechless." Man is the result of the forces that work in and through his organism. What his life depends on what he is and what his surroundings are. He is the fruit of heredity, of education, of circumstances. His "punishment" is simply the effect of antecedents, of causes, near and remote. Under necessarily finite and imperfect human law he must be held responsible for his unsocial acts, but this responsibility in no way justifies to him the scheme of the universe, of which scheme he is the victim. How fatuous to say that the man paralyzed by a stroke of lightning has no ground of complaint because, forsooth, his "punishment" is simply "the direct result of his own life"! What is true of the lightning stroke is true of every ill that comes upon man in this world, although the problem is often complicated to the superficial observer by many factors of contributory negligence on the sufferer's own part. But untangle these threads of causation and trace them to their source, and it is found that the primary cause of human maladjustment is natural imperfection or maladjustment. Grant that there is an intelligent, infinit "First Cause" and there is no possible escape from the conclusion that that "God" is morally as well as actually responsible for all the misery in the universe which he created. The Examiner—very liberal for an orthodox journal—has not washed the blood from the robes of its deity, and it cannot. It has merely disguised the stains with a solution of sophistry.

The members of the Freethought Letter-Writing Corps have had a good rest of a few weeks, and now we hope that they will every one send a shot plumb to the center of this week's target. The New York Sunday World of May 5th has an editorial on "The Old Testament as Literature." It is asserted that the Hebrew scriptures are of "transcendent importance to literature and to the science of civilization." Following this we find the claims reproduced below:

"The man who cannot understand the Book of Genesis cannot understand the philosophy of later history. If he cannot understand Job he will never know anything more than the mere surface of Shakspeare. To know the meaning of the books of Kings and of Ecclesiastes is to become able to appreciate the Iliad of Homer and the epistles of Horace. To enter into the spirit of Isaiah is to come close to the vital force of aspiration which governs modern times and moves the world. Fully to understand the modern man the primitive man must also be understood. Hebrew literature collected in the Old Testament gives a record of human development from the most primitive times to a period of civilization in many respects as high as our own. Taken altogether it constitutes the fullest history of the evolution of the human mind ever put on record. Its value to literature is not less so. Instead of being wild and barbaric the poetry of the Hebrew scriptures moves 'to the lute's well-ordered law.' The sublimity of its sentiment compels expression in musical simplicity which has made it everlasting.

"Considered merely as literature, the Hebrew scriptures explain their own immortality. If the book of Job could have been lost after having been published it might be possible even now to deny the probability of the continued progress of the human race. But the race which knows how to reverence such lofty thought must be impelled forward by it from one generation to another until it has achieved its highest possibilities."

It will not be difficult for the writers of the corps to refute in a few sentences each of the extravagant statements of this article. It will be advisable for each member not to take up more than one point, or two points, at most, so as to avoid the risk of too greatly extending his communication, as the World wants very short letters, as a rule. The article is a very vulnerable target, considered as a whole.

The Paine Celebration.

Arrangements for the Paine Celebration to be held at New Rochelle on Decoration Day, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, Manhattan Liberal Club, and Newark Liberal League, are completed. A special train has been chartered, which will leave the Grand Central Depot of this city at 10:45 a.m., and by a special agreement with the railroad company the committee of arrangements have been able to make the price of the tickets fifty cents each. Those who will speak include Henry Rowley, T. B. Wakeman, E. B. Foote, Jr., Wilson Macdonald, Charles H. Machett, and Rev. F. E. Mason. The wall and gate around the monument will be repaired before the 30th of May, and the Freethinkers who attend will have the pleasure of seeing almost a new monument and inclosure. As the gathering this year is intended to be more of a social one than last, and the time not to be devoted exclusively to speech making, it would be well for those who attend to take lunch baskets. There is plenty of room for parties to sit and partake of lunch; also to get up any game that may add to the enjoyment of the occasion. Those living in adjoining states and towns who will attend, can send to this office for tickets, thus saving time and delay on the day of excursion. Every Freethinker or other person interested in the works and life and worth of Thomas Paine is expected to go, and the associations promise that a good time will be had. As it is the duty of this generation and those to follow to honor the memory of the dead who gave their lives that the Union might continue, so it is the duty of all intelligent and justice-loving people to honor the memory of a man who did as much as any other, if not more, to secure the independence of this country. Those who go will kindly try to be at the station a quarter of an hour before the train leaves, so that there will be plenty of time for all to get seats without inconvenience. Last year about fifty were left behind on account of their late arrival.

About that "Reaction" from Scientific Methods.

The religious papers and magazines, echoed by the political journals and other watchers of the popular drift, are hailing the reactionary utterances of Romanes, Kidd, Drummond, Balfour, and Brunetiere with expressions of joy as wild as those which rose from the parched lips of the besieged of Lucknow when they heard in the distance the first faint notes from the pipes of the Highlanders. Why they should be so extravagantly delighted is not very clear when the fact is taken into consideration that they have all along been telling us that there was no danger—that the "old book" was not in the least damaged by the successive or simultaneous attacks upon it of the different schools of critics. It was of no use, they unitedly and vociferously proclaimed, for the enemies of revelation to rush against the rock-built fortress of revelation—upon it had dashed to their death Celsus and the other pagan writers, Voltaire and the Encyclopedists, Paine and his brother Deists of England, and all the other precursors of the modern scientists, Higher Critics, and Freethinkers, and these latter were sure to share the fate of their predecessors, while "the faith once delivered to the saints" would be stronger than ever, when the smoke of battle lifted. If they really meant all they said, and if they were not talking merely to encourage the rank and file, why all this exultation because of some weak apologies for Christianity from the pens of a few men, some of whom were supposed to have definitely abandoned the old creed, but others of whom have never been known as Rationalists? If there was no danger, why be so happy over the appearance of a squad of poorly disciplined and worse armed reinforcements?

Much has been made, by the religious sentinels, of Brunetiere's phrase, "The bankruptcy of science." They have not stopped to inquire what science is, and on the answer to that question depends the answer to the other question, Is it possible to bankrupt her? Neither have they stopped to inquire what it was that Brunetiere and his followers meant or what they wanted. Some light is thrown upon the subject in both its aspects by an editorial in the New York Evening Post of April 27, portions of which we subjoin:

"THE BANKRUPTCY OF SCIENCE."

"The article under this title, published some months ago in the Revue des Deux Mondes by M. Ferdinand Brunetiere, has had a great run. Thoughtful religious editors, professionally alert to detect "reactions" against science, have extracted a vast amount of comfort out of it. Evidently science has been getting far too ambitious and going much too fast, and must, like Mr. Brooke, 'pull up.' We need not be so particular what we believe, after all. True, it would not do to go back to the somewhat narrow theological views of our fathers—we have improved on their conceptions, no doubt; but our rash young ministers and students who think they can improve on our conceptions must be convinced by the solemn warnings of M. Brunetiere that they are following false lights.

"We did not observe that it occurred to any of these wise heads, thus gravely wagged, to inquire what title M. Brunetiere had to speak for science, bankrupt or solvent. But it does seem to have occurred to many in France, and some eight hundred of them met in Paris on April 4 to give their answers. The occasion was a banquet offered to the distinguished chemist, M. Marcellin Berthelot, by the 'Union de la Jeunesse Française.' There were present leading senators and deputies, many representatives of the higher education, artists and men of letters—as notable a gathering as Paris could furnish—all met to honor not merely the guest of the evening but the scientific spirit which he represented and adorned. M. Brunetiere showed that he was aware of the drift of the banquet by writing to the Figaro, before it came off, that it was to be offered against him as much as to Berthelot. Universal laughter was, in fact, provoked by Professor Perrier, one of the speakers of the evening, when he closed a witty speech by drinking to 'the reconciliation of science and M. Brunetiere.'

"More serious and measured was the discourse of M. Berthelot himself, in which he took occasion to set forth the spirit, the aim, the methods, and the limitations of science in judicious terms. He affirmed that the entire strength of science lay in the method of observation and experiment, and in its refusal to give the name of exact knowledge to anything otherwise derived. The true man of science is modest and cautious in his assertions. This very fact, which is really an honor to him, is often made a ground of reproach. But the genuine savant knows the limits of the human mind, recognizes his own fallibility, and so never publishes a catechism of science, never declares himself the infallible organ of an unchanging scientific doctrine.

"How there can ever be a bankruptcy of science, thus defined, without at the same time a bankruptcy of the human intellect, and of civilization itself, does not appear. Indeed, even the religious editors so far appreciate the empire that scientific method has won in the world as not to expect to see it abandoned. Only, they say, let it be kept to its proper sphere. Let it not poach on the preserves of theology. If it does that they will be compelled to take up the cry:

"O star-eyed Science, hast thou wandered there
To waft us back the message of despair?"

"The late Professor Romanes swung round a curious circle in the course of his life. He began as a dogmatic denier of the tenableness of a Theistic belief, and finally came to the position that orthodox Christianity was really not inconsistent with any positive teachings of science. With him, clearly, religion was almost purely a personal, subjective emotion. At first he had it not, and thought science taught him it was irrational; then he came to have it, and thought science had nothing to say about it one way or the other. [Which shows how very superficial was his later thought.—Ed. T. S.]

"Such experiences are confessedly exceptional, and that science does tend to make people fastidious as to both what they believe and how they believe, the dogmatic theologians themselves are sufficient witnesses. They know their enemy, and not for nothing have they been so consistent in withstanding the conclusions of astronomy, geology, historical investigation, even of Biblical criticism. But perhaps the strangest thing of all about the welcome they have extended to M. Brunetiere's bankruptcy of science is the fact that they have ignored or concealed the real significance of the phrase in his mouth. As M. Brisson declared at the Berthelot banquet, this 'formula' was not advanced as a part of a controversy which was purely scientific or philosophic, or even religious; it was above all things 'un mot d'ordre politique.' It was a reactionary government that the writers about the bankruptcy of science wanted first of all, and through that, and only as a consequence of that, the suppression of freedom of teaching and the establishment of a state religion. When they said bankruptcy of science, they meant bankruptcy of a government under which science and discussion were free, and wanted to have themselves appointed receivers to administer the goods, not of science, but of the body politic. If this is true, what Brunetiere was about was not so much the rehabilitating of Balaam's ass, and the sun and moon standing still for Joshua, as the restoration of absolutism in state and church."

They Obeyed the Bible.

Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.—Ex. xxii, 18.

A story of cruelty and superstition, culminating in the murder of a woman by her relatives, who thought her bewitched, comes from Ireland through the London Daily News. The young woman's name was Bridget Cleary, and she lived with her husband at Cloneen, near Clonmel, county Tipperary.

Ten persons were arrested, nine of whom were charged jointly and severally with committing the murder. These were Michael Cleary, the husband; Patrick Boland, her father; Patrick Kennedy, James Kennedy, Michael Kennedy, and William Kennedy, cousins; Mary Kennedy, an aunt; John Dunne, and William Ahearne, neighbors.

Dennis Gancy, an herb doctor, was charged with being an accessory before the fact. William Simpson and Johanna Burke, both of whom lived near the Clearys, were the principal witnesses. Their testimony was substantially the same, and this is the story as they told it:

Mrs. Cleary had been ill for some time, and on the night of March 14th Mrs. Burke went to see her. She met Simpson and his wife outside. The door was locked, and Mrs. Burke told Simpson that Michael Cleary had said they were giving Mrs. Cleary some herbs which they got from a man over the mountain.

Voices could be heard inside, saying, "Take it, you witch!" and, "Take it, you old fagot, or we will kill you!"

When they finally gained admittance they saw Dunne and three of the Kennedys holding Mrs. Cleary down on the bed by her hands and feet. Her husband was standing by the bed with some decoction in a spoon. He called for a vile liquid, which was poured over the woman's body. A man at each side of the bed kept the body swinging about. The woman screamed horribly. Then she was forced to take the decoction out of the spoon, and Cleary asked:

"Are you Bridget Boland, the wife of Michael Cleary? Answer in the name of God!"

She answered: "I am Bridget Boland, in the name of God!"

"Come home, Bridget Boland!" they all cried, and then Simpson understood that they thought her body had been taken possession of by a witch, which they were endeavoring to drive out.

After the woman had answered the question several times, John Dunne said: "Hold her over the fire, and she will answer then."

She was taken from the bed and carried to the kitchen, where she was placed in a sitting position over the fire. Simpson noticed some red marks on her body and was told that they had used a red-hot poker on her to make her take the medicine.

As she was held over the fire, she was compelled to make answer several times, "I am Bridget Boland, daughter of Pat Boland, in the name of God." Then, groaning and screaming, she was carried back to bed.

The night after this occurrence Mrs. Burke went to sit up with Mrs. Cleary. She and the others present dressed the woman, who sat at the fire with them and talked about the fairies. Mrs. Burke made some tea and offered a cup to Mrs. Cleary, but before she could take it her husband jumped up and, taking three bits of bread and jam, said his wife should eat them before she should have a sup. He asked her three times, "Are you Bridget Cleary, my wife, in the name of God?" Twice she answered and ate two pieces of the bread. The third time she did not answer.

Cleary forced the bread into her mouth, saying, "If you don't take it down you will go." He flung her on the ground and, putting his knee on her chest and one hand upon her throat, forced the bread and jam down. "Swallow it," he shouted. "Is it down?"

He took a lighted stick and held it to her mouth to see if she had swallowed. At this point Mrs. Burke and the others wanted to leave the house, but Cleary said he would not open the door till he got his wife back. He told his wife he would burn her if she did not answer to her name three times. Her reply did not satisfy him.

He seized a burning lamp and threw it at her. In a moment she was in a blaze. She screamed frantically, but her husband cried: "Hold your tongue! It is not Bridget I am burning; you will soon see the witch going up the chimney."

Mrs. Burke admitted in her testimony that she afterward saw the corpse carried out of the house in a bag. It was found a week later at the bottom of a ditch, under two feet of mud, on the lands of Tullycussane.

A Plain Case of Insolvency.

"Yes, sir," said the cross-eyed religious editor, as he adjusted a new pair of scientifically-focussed glasses in order that he might read the telegraphic and cable news; "yes, sir, science is bankrupt, as Prof. Pandango Pomdeterre of the Sourbuns College has so aptly said; and I think I shall editorialize on the subject, in extenso, in the forthcoming number of the Whoop in Israel." The religious editor was at breakfast, and putting a spoonful of scientifically-condensed milk into his coffee and spreading his bread with a superior article of butterine, he looked across the table at his fellow-boarder, the clergyman. The latter, who was constitutionally hard of hearing, took from his pocket an artificial tympanum, which he placed in his ear, and as he touched an electric bell to summon the waiter, he replied:

"You are quite right. The argument of Professor Pomdeterre renders that conclusion inevitable, and I had already thought of making it my sermon theme on the coming Sabbath. By the way, have you glanced at the weather forecast this morning? It is quite convenient to know whether one should take his umbrella or leave it at home."

"You may venture to leave it," answered the religious editor, "for a fair day is predicted. But I notice that the devout people of Texas are praying for rain." The eyes of the two met over their plates and then fell into them. When conversation was renewed it touched upon a less embarrassing topic.

"It is gratifying to note," resumed the religious editor, "that the war in the East is drawing to a close—"

"For which let us thank God," the clergyman ejaculated with fervent piety.

"Which is due," continued the editor, "to the employment of scientific modes and weapons of warfare, making modern war enormously expensive and therefore necessarily brief."

"I would much prefer," returned the preacher, "to attribute the cessation of hostilities to the influence of that message of peace which reached the earth almost two thousand years ago."

"Would that we might," replied the journalist

"but as all that Japan has adopted from us is our rifles and cannon, and as the Chinese show greater aptitude for learning our vices than our religion, I fear we can not. That message of peace, we must infer, had reference to a spiritual blessing. If we were to regard it as a promise that war should be thenceforth unknown, blind unbelief might remind us that Christianity had not met its obligations and was, in fact, bankrupt—er—hum, hum."

The editor paused and picked a fine set of store teeth which, by enabling him to masticate his food, had nipped a promising case of chronic dyspepsia.

The gentlemen left the house together, and after walking a short distance along the smooth composite pavement, the editor stopped at a pay station to telephone a message to Kokomo, Ind., where a religious conference was discussing the scientific problem of bacilli in the communion cup. Then taking a street car, which, though neither pushed nor pulled, made good speed nevertheless, the clergyman addressed an inquiry to the conductor about a woman who had been struck by the motor not long before, and who was picked up paralyzed. "It was nothing much," said the collector of fares. "While the parson was holdin' a prayer-meetin' for her benefit the doctors lifted up a little piece of the skull that was pressin' against her brains, and she come to. She thinks it was the prayin' that cured her, though, because she was on her way to church when the collusion happened."

In the conversational lull which ensued the minister purchased for two cents a newspaper embellished with a score of attractive illustrations made according to the latest scientific method, and containing reading matter enough to last him all day. He read in it the story of a Sunday-school superintendent who had absconded with half the funds of a bank of which he was the cashier, and with all the funds of a church of which he was the treasurer. Also about the trial of one preacher for heresy, and of another for general immorality, and he wondered which sort of trial would go hardest with him if his sentiments and conduct were known to his congregation. A column headed "Scientific Progress" engaged his attention. Here were accounts of the cure of religious monomania by new methods; the effects of scientific sanitation on morals; antiseptic solutions, germicides, parasiticides, eye-sharpeners; discoveries in astronomy, in mechanics, in engineering; life-saving boats, signal systems for railways, new applications of electricity and other natural forces, including the falls of Niagara, to the uses of civilization; geological discoveries proving the antiquity of man; researches in anthropology, showing human improvement in the past and why we may hope for a continuance of the same in the future; in short, it seemed to the clerical reader that about all useful advance was making along scientific lines. There was also in the paper a sermon by Talmage, which he skipped.

The clergyman accompanied the religious journalist to his office to see him edit. "I should like," he said to his companion, "to glance over your leader on the 'Bankruptcy of Science,' when you shall have written it, as it may fructify my mind for next Sabbath's discourse. No doubt you are so full of your subject that I would need to wait but a few moments in order to see the manuscript. I of course prefer, before venturing into a domain where you are so much more at home than myself, to know exactly in what the bankruptcy of science consists. For example, what are its liabilities, that is, its obligations, i. e., its promises, as compared with these assets?" and he laid the paper on the desk where the editor could see the column headed "Scientific Progress."

The editor clapped pen to paper and the clergyman proceeded to wait. When he was tired of waiting, and had read everything in the office except the Bible and the Concordance, he asked if he might now peruse the manuscript, but receiving a reply from which he inferred that the leader was not yet ready for inspection, nor the editor for a pair of wings, he silently withdrew.

On receiving the next number of the Whoop in Israel, the clergyman turned quickly to the editorial page. It contained nothing on the "Bankruptcy of Science" but a condensation of the article of Professor Pomdeterre of the College of Sourbuns. On the following Monday the editor sought in the morning paper for a report of the clergyman's sermon on the same subject. He found what he was after, but it turned out to be an elaboration of his own condensation of the article of Prof. Fandango Pomdeterre of the Sourbuns College.

Freethought and Secular News from England.

FREETHOUGHT IN PARLIAMENT.—On March 1 Mr. E. T. Gourley, member of Parliament for Sunderland, introduced into the House of Commons the "Religious Prosecutions Abolition Bill," when it was read the first time. An interesting debate is expected on the second reading. The object of the bill is to do away with all prosecutions for "the expression of opinion upon matters of religion." The schedule is copied verbatim from the bill that was introduced by Mr. Bradlaugh in 1889. We hope this parliamentary action will remove the legal impediment that has hitherto interfered with the principle of liberty of speech. Many prominent members of the House have promised to give the bill their hearty support. In the House of Lords, Lord Hubhouse has introduced a bill that will, if it is passed, sweep away the absurd law under cover of which certain fanatical societies have been trying to put an end to Sunday lectures and concerts. Petitions are widely circulated and are being numerous signed in favor of the bill. We are thus moving in England, although perhaps slowly, toward the goal of freedom.

DISESTABLISHMENT AND DISENDOWMENT.—The English Church party has been driven into a state of frenzy on account of the introduction into the House of Commons, by the Home Secretary, of the bill to disestablish and disendow the church in Wales. The provisions of the bill are these. It proposes that on Jan. 1, 1897, the Church of England, so far as it is established in Wales and Monmouthshire, shall cease to be an Established Church. From and after that date both the privileges and duties incident to the status of Establishment will come to an end. The coercive jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts will cease; what is now ecclesiastical law will be enforceable so far as it affects the discipline of the clergy and the doctrines and ceremonies of the church by way of contract, and as far as it affects the use of property by way of trust. Provision will be made in the bill for the formation of a representative church body, and power is given to the bishops and clergy and laity of the whole synod in Wales to frame a constitution and generally to legislate in ecclesiastical matters for themselves. The funds now used for church purposes are, if the bill becomes law, to be employed as follows: The erection or support of cottage or other hospitals; the support of convalescent homes; the provision of trained nurses for the sick poor; the foundation and maintenance of public, parish, or district halls, institutes, and libraries; the provision of laborers' dwellings, to be let at reasonable rents and allotments; technical and higher education, including the establishment of libraries and museums, and galleries of art, of local or general utility, for which provision is not made by statute. Of course the bill is being vehemently opposed by the Tories and the clergy, and it is not difficult to foretell its fate if it reaches the House of Lords. Still, it is an excellent movement in the right direction. It is monstrous that the state should favor any form of theology; that is not its function, and it is a gross injustice that public funds should be devoted to promulgate a faith which is not accepted by the majority of the nation. If people will have a religion, let them support it themselves. It should be a question of individual opinion, not of national injustice.

THE LATE DR. ROMANES.—There is much rejoicing in orthodox circles at the relapse of Dr. Romanes, who just before his death, it is said, returned to the faith of his youth. His "Thoughts on Religion," recently published, is edited by Charles Gore, Canon of Westminster. The work contains but little evidence to justify the professor's departure from the land of fact and his re-entrance into the field of speculation. Evidently he thought that there was much virtue in an "if." Again and again he indulges in the reiteration "if such and such be true," "supposing" so and so "to be true." Just so, but supposing that to which he refers is not true? What we have a right to expect in reference to such a change as that which is said to have taken place in Dr. Romanes's views is not mere supposition, but evidence. When in some instances he writes positively, it is not very complimentary to the honesty of Christ or to the reality of the foundation of his faith. The doctor says that "the Genesis story of the fall of man is allegorical, and that the devils which Jesus was supposed to expel from the bodies of maniacs were mere creatures of the imagination." Even Canon Gore felt bound to protest against his imputation of what is really either ignorance or dishonesty upon the part of Christ. The canon says: "The emphasis which Jesus Christ lays on diabolical agency is so great that if it is not a reality, he must be regarded either as shrewdly misled about realities which concern the spiritual life, or else as seriously misleading others." There is nothing surprising in a person changing his views, but it is disappointing to find that such an able man as the late professor undoubtedly was failed to give a reasonable justification for his retreat.

INEQUALITIES OF RICH AND POOR.—WHAT IS TO BE DONE?—In my opinion the true remedy would be to largely reconstruct our social relations, the reform of the pension list, the reduction of the salaries of over-paid officials, the cultivation and the proper use of the land, the giving of more attention to the secular needs of the people, and bestowing less time and resources on what are called the spiritual wants of the community. The church has had its trial, with every advantage in its favor, and the present wretched condition of society is the result. It is now time that something should be done, not only to lend a helping hand, but to deal with the chronic causes of trade dislocation and slackness. The period has gone by for talking generalities about this question. What is required is that practical steps be taken which will lessen the friction of trade changes, equalize the burden as between capital and labor, lessen the rigors of the poor law, throw open new channels for the temporary employment of labor, secure an equitable use of wealth, and the substitution of attention to this world for the consideration given to an imaginary future existence.

CHARLES WATTS.

Paine and the "Higher Critics."

In The New Unity of April 4, a contributor signing himself "A. W. G." has something to say and makes a quotation that may be of interest to the editor of the Portland Oregonian, who holds that Thomas Paine "is a figure of no importance in the history of religion." We reproduce the communication for three reasons: Because it shows that, despite the "coarseness" and "flippancy" and "lack of culture" with which he is charged by those who accept the clergy as authority instead of reading his works, Paine anticipated by many years the conclusions of the refined and serious and scholarly critics of this century; because it gives the Presbyterian fossils some deserved raps, and because it bestows due credit upon Paine for his humanitarian teachings. Of course we have no use for the word "religion" in the sense in which it is used by "A. W. G." "Religion" is indelibly stained with the follies and crimes of supernaturalism, and it can only confuse and deceive to talk of "character-religion." As to the "character-religion" teachings attributed to Jesus, we do not think that the Presbyterians will have any trouble in finding plenty of teachings in the "accounts" that directly contradict those upon which "A. W. G." relies to sustain his position. As we look at the matter, it makes precious little difference to this generation what the Bible says "Jesus" taught; it is of prime importance that the people learn what the experience of the race before and since the first century of this era has been and what are the lessons fairly derivable therefrom. The contributor says:

A remarkable discovery has been made recently. It has been found that a number of the results of the higher criticism of the present day had been anticipated in a book published a hundred years ago. That book was the "Age of Reason," and its author was Thomas Paine; and the Presbyterian Doctor of Divinity who sets forth this remarkable discovery in a denominational magazine accompanies it with these very pertinent comments:

One can hardly imagine that, even at the bidding of German critics and their English copyists, the Evangelical churches will be in a hurry to credit the astounding proposition that what, according to the higher critics, was hid from Jesus Christ, of whom Peter said, "Thou, Lord, knowest all things," and who claimed to understand the secrets of the Father, was, eighteen centuries afterwards, revealed to Thomas Paine; and that while Jesus Christ was wrong in saying that Moses wrote of him, Thomas Paine was right in asserting that Moses did no such thing. That the Evangelical churches in Scotland (unless they mean to dig their own graves!) will be impelled, before long, to let their voices be heard on the attitude they intend to assume toward the sentiments of Paine, which, under cover of the Higher Criticism and with much show of learning, are being industriously propagated by not a few of their responsible teachers, is to the present writer clear as day.

What the Presbyterian church will do to those who propagate the sentiments of Paine "under cover of the Higher Criticism," we do not know; nor do we care very much. We are not absorbingly interested in the Higher Criticism. To those who think the Bible the source of all religion and all salvation, the Higher Criticism is naturally the most vital question of human life; but to those who think the Bible is not the source of all religion, but rather that religion is the source of all Bibles, the question of religion is more absorbing than the question of Higher Criticism. And those of us who believe in the religion of character have been nourishing the conviction that this character-religion was gradually spreading to the orthodox ranks. But if every man is to be a heretic who teaches the sentiments of Thomas Paine, the spread of character-religion will be rudely checked, for Paine declared that his religion also was "to do good."

And there is a still more perplexing problem involved in this proscription of Paine's sentiments. If we read the accounts rightly, this character-religion was preached two thousand years ago by Jesus himself, who said that not those who called him "Lord, Lord," but those who fed the hungry and clothed the naked, had the religion that should save them. What will our Presbyterian friends do with Jesus for thus contradicting their creeds and propagating the sentiments of Paine "under cover" of religion? Will they be impelled before long to let their voices be heard against Jesus himself and put him out of their church?

Observations.

That letter of our uncle Samuel Rhodes of Biscayne Bay to the editor of Public Opinion, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 27th, did its perfect work, and the readers of Public Opinion owe Uncle Samuel a vote of thanks and an expression of confidence. His grievance against the paper was that while it promised to give "every shade of every faith," and while for eight or nine years he had been paying good money for it on the strength of that promise, it in fact gave only such shades as were lurid with orthodoxy. I have before me a copy of that journal published since the little discussion took place between the editor and Mr. Rhodes. It says nothing about giving "every shade of every faith," but it comes pretty near doing so, for Liberal sentiment is almost as well represented as its opposite. There is even an extract from the writings of Thomas Paine. Mr. Rhodes may be pleased to know that the editor of Public Opinion has asked to have his journal placed upon THE TRUTH SEEKER's exchange list. So the suns come and go, and the thoughts of men are widened with their processes.

Two murders have recently been committed in a San Francisco church, the victims being girls who were lured into the edifice, assaulted, and killed. A young man named Durrant, the librarian and assistant Sunday-school superintendent, is under arrest and the pastor is under suspicion. The ministers of San Francisco have been officious in agitating for the passage of an ordinance to close the side doors or family entrances to the saloons, and now the saloon keepers are getting back at them. They have laid before the supervisors a petition, in which they set forth that in view of the heinous crimes just committed in a church of that city it is high time to call the attention of the authorities to the use to which buildings occupied as churches are put, and to suggest a remedy. While there are many such edifices in which no immoralities or murders are known to occur, yet for the general public safety the petitioners are of opinion that an ordinance should be passed closing all side and rear entrances to all churches in the city and county, and forbidding therein partitions, separate rooms, bedrooms, or bed-lounges; that no person but the authorized sexton shall have a key to the buildings, and that he shall be at all times under the immediate supervision of the police; that no church shall be opened without the consent of adjacent property owners; that no license shall be granted to any minister who has not a good moral character, and that the signatures of at least twelve citizens and tax-payers shall be attached to the application for such license. In this way, it is hoped, the church business will be brought under control until such time as a quickened public conscience shall abolish it altogether. The petitioners add that their memorial is not conceived in malice, but with the honorable and lofty purpose of protecting the lives of young girls and to prevent the turning of church edifices into shambles, brothels, or houses of assignation. And the petitioners will ever pray.

It is a soberly written document, its points are well sustained, and it was gravely argued before the supervisors by the attorney for the signers. The prompt squelch it got from the board was to be foreseen, but it reached the public through the newspapers, and has therefore done the work it was intended to do. It travesties with fine irony the slap dash, hit-or-miss, dragnet methods of a big lot of reformers who have not been able to view themselves in the clear light in which they stand before others.

Mr. Henry Nichols appeared before the Brooklyn Philosophical Association on Sunday, April 28th, to participate in a debate with President Rowley on the rival merits of Protection and Free-trade. The announcement of the event that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER all last month did not state on which side of the question Mr. Nichols would plank himself, neither does the New York Herald's report of the engagement give any positive information on that head, but from the language of the speaker I judge him to be a protectionist. Instead of discussing the proposition as he should in the presence of philosophical persons, he ignored its ethical aspect and betook himself incontinently to roasting the administration, which is admittedly imbecil, and to denouncing the Democratic party, which we all know is as vile as the Republican, Populist, Prohibition, or any other. But what have these to do with free trade and human happiness? It is no wonder that the audience, as reported, called the orator down, and that President Rowley forbore to present his side of the question, leaving each hearer to decide for himself. Mr. Nichols made the error of assuming that presidents and other politicians, in these days when presidents and other politicians are both useless and unornamental, exist for some other purpose than to enjoy the emoluments of office. He appears to have erred, further, in treating the tariff as a question of economics rather than as an everyday matter of oppression and plunder.

Women bicyclists of Grand Rapids, Michigan, to the number of one hundred and fifty, assembled the other day and held something between a teachers' institute and a prayer-meeting to debate the question of Costume. Two hours of discussion resulted in the following resolution, which was adopted with unanimity and enthusiasm: "WHEREAS, Our Heavenly Father, with divine love and infinite wisdom in our creation, has made us bipeds and endowed us with reason [not necessarily]; and, whereas, the regulation skirts, as established by long usage and custom, are hindrances to the proper freedom and use of these pedal extremities as intended by an all-wise Creator; and, whereas, the most convenient and truly modest dress is the one which clothes each leg in separate covering; and, whereas, prejudice, rather than true modesty, restrains reform in clothing our legs; therefore, be it Resolved, That we most reverently recognize the superiority of the infinite wisdom and divine love of our Heavenly Father, and that in all cases where, in our best judgment, the regulation skirt is unhealthful, impractical, or inconvenient, we will have the moral courage to adopt such costume as will eliminate these objections."

The simultaneous discovery by the Grand Rapids girls of their own bipedal gifts, as mentioned above, and their ardent resolve to clothe the same in obedience to the dictates of health, comfort, and convenience, is a coincidence worthy of the prominence here accorded it; but they err in imputing to their heavenly father the design that each limb shall have a separate covering of clothes. So far as observation, directed by holy writ, enables us to penetrate the devices of the almighty, neither "regulation skirts," nor bloomers, nor yet full trousers, for either sex, are in consonance with the divine purpose; the naked truth being that, male and female, he has posed us like Trilby, in the altogether. The work of the deity is often quite coarse.

Fulton Gordon, of Louisville, Ky., came upon his wife and a young man in an assignation house, and shot them both to death. Although the murdered man was a son of Governor Brown of Kentucky, and the woman a member of the Presbyterian church, the coroner's jury found that it was a case of "justifiable homicide," with which verdict I disagree. If Gordon was not a murderer, he was criminally insane. Why, otherwise, should he shoot his wife? If she deceived him as to her affection for himself, she was not worth the powder. If he knew she no longer cared for him, he should have been enough of a gentleman to release her. If his affection for the woman was such that he could not sustain the thought of separation—which view is untenable, since by his own act he has lost her now for keeps—he would have tried to win her back. He may talk about his honor, but a man who will shoot a defenseless woman has no honor. As for Brown, he died like a fool. He must have been familiar with the barbarous code under which he met death, and he knew that his course was suicidal. There are those who would maintain his right in doing as he did, but nobody can defend his discretion. Besides, he probably believed he was doing wrong, although it is supposed to be incumbent on every gentleman, under the above code, to commit a similar indiscretion whenever opportunity is afforded, and the one who should profess otherwise would be neither believed nor esteemed. The offense consists in being detected. In consideration of these aspects of the case, it is only as a victim of a pernicious code that Brown would have my sympathy. This clandestine association with married women, without their husbands' knowledge or consent, is to the last degree impolitic and unsocial, and I doubt very much that it is moral.

Report says that Governor Brown will decline to prosecute the slayer of his son, and that he admits the killing to have been justified by the circumstances, and it is highly probable that the son would take the same view in the case of the elder Brown if the situation were reversed. Such fathers may always depend upon having that kind of sons. The relatives of the murdered woman should pursue a different course. Gordon should be arraigned and tried—he should be so tried that the enormity of his crime would break upon him, that he would be convicted, and sentenced to live (in jail), with every facility afforded him for committing suicide.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

The Kind of a Man Colonel Ingersoll Is.

This great lawyer, orator, teacher, and humanitarian was warmly and rapturously greeted at the Wysox Grand on Monday night by a magnificent audience of educated men and women. More than a thousand auditors gave eager and rapt attention to the words of love and wisdom as they fell from the lips and silver tongue of the world's greatest champion of human rights and mental liberty. The good seed which he has planted in Muncie, and the good seed which he is scattering broadcast throughout the country, from ocean to ocean, and from the lakes to the gulf, will take root in the hearts of millions of our fellow-men, and germinate and blossom and ripen into golden fruits of peace and love, and joy and liberty. The gospel of love and kindness, which this great apostle emphasizes in his teaching, and so beautifully illustrates in his life, must, in the near future, rescue all intelligent men and women from the darkness and cruelty of religious superstition, and bring them to the light of reason and the practice of gentleness and toleration. The world has always been in need, and is still in need, of more love and greater kindness, and surely it is our duty to assist this great and good man to achieve this grand and noble and glorious end.

Whatever concerns one man concerns all men—the planet on which we live is a small body, and there are no people on its surface so remote from us that their happiness and welfare are not bound up with ours—the joys and sorrows, the hopes and the fears of all mankind, are indissolubly knit together—none can suffer wrong without all sharing in that wrong—none can feel the delightful thrills of joy without all sharing in that joy—the world at large cannot grow wiser and make us more ignorant—the world at large cannot grow better and make us grow worse—the world at large cannot grow happier and make us more miserable, and it is therefore evident that our sympathies, like Colonel Ingersoll's, should be catholic and universal and co-extensive with the race—we should seek to supplant ignorance with intelligence—we should strive to substitute knowledge for blind credulity—we should earnestly labor to remove cruelty from the world, and plant the seeds of kindness in every breast, and, knowing as we do, if we know anything, that religious superstition had its origin in the dens and caves of savagery, and that, infinitely above all other causes, it has cursed the world and filled the earth with blood and sorrow, it certainly should be our duty, our pleasure, our joy, and our delight to assist Colonel Ingersoll in driving fear and ignorance and superstition from the brain of man, and lighting in their stead the sacred flame of reason.

He loves the good and hates the bad in the life of every man. He loves the good and hates the bad in every book, whether it is regarded as sacred or profane. He believes that happiness is the only good, that love is the only real religion, and that every home should be made a heaven. He believes in the sanctuary of the fireside, and that wife and child should be adored—he believes in temperance, charity, freedom, gladness, liberty, tolerance, kindness, intellectual hospitality, and justice, and in all these things every good man will concur. He disbelieves in malicious demons and in tribal gods. He disbelieves in popes and priests and inspired books. He disbelieves in the supernatural and in the miraculous, and with him the wise men of the earth, the savans and scientists, agree.

If we lay aside our prejudices—if we will forget our vested interests in hoary-headed fallacies and venerable falsehoods—if we will crucify our jealousies, our hates and envies, and remember only that we are men—if we can eliminate from our minds the traditions and inheritances that have come down to us from the darkness of the distant past, we can never speak the name of Ingersoll except in accents of love and gratitude.

Yet he will be maligned—he has been maligned and assailed—but the shafts of falsehood and malice will forever fall harmless against the impenetrable armor of goodness and greatness with which he is completely panoplied—in the far-off centuries yet to come, music, elegantly dressed and divinely attuned, will perpetuate the memory of this marvelous man of the nineteenth century—millions upon millions of men and women yet to be will sing his praises and call him blessed—the pagodas of superstition will not then cast their dark and dismal shadows upon the earth, but in their places will be erected rock-built temples, dedicated to science, to liberty, to justice, and to art, and their walls will be adorned with magnificent portraits of Robert G. Ingersoll, surpassing any painting that ever came forth from the magic touches of Raphael or Angelo.

American manhood and American womanhood will then awaken admiration and wonder, and will become fitter objects of study and contemplation than any statuary ever chiseled by a Grecian master—the intellects of the people will be keener and finer than any that ever debated in the Roman Senate or the Roman Forum—our civilization will furnish rapture and pleasure to all her children, and a golden cestus of clasped hands will then encircle the whole earth, and in the midst of this most marvelous civilization will break forth a song of gratitude embalming the memory of Robert G. Ingersoll, which will continue to reverberate around the whole circumference of the earth, as long as it is fit for the habitation of man.

May each of us feel it to be our duty, our pleasure, and our privilege to assist him in the destruction of sectarian hatred and bigotry, and when this work is completed we will be ushered into the glorious era of peace and reason and the brotherhood of man.

It will be a sad day for the race when his great brain crumbles into dust, but with Socrates and Bruno, with Humboldt and Spencer, he will forever occupy a conspicuous place in the pantheons of the civilized world.

THE Fellowship for Ethical Research meets Wednesdays at 8.15 P.M., at Mercantile Library Hall, Tenth, below Market street, Philadelphia.

A Little More Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to anything good.

"An Important Intimation."

There are, we regret to say, between one thousand and two thousand of our friends who have allowed their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to expire without renewing. This is a considerably larger portion than is pleasant to us, who depend upon the more or less prompt payment of subscriptions for the wherewithal to meet our bills. Now, we are not going to get angry, or scold, or do anything disagreeable about this, but we must appeal to our friends' good nature and generous feelings to remedy this deplorable and unsatisfactory state of affairs. We need the money badly—so do our creditors. The paper man, and the printer, and the compositor, and the mailer, and the post-office collector, and the clerks, and the landlord, and the insurance man, and the gas man, and the devil are always with us, not to mention the rest, and they all want money and want it bad, and want it when it is due. And when we haven't got it for them life is a burden—they make it so intentionally, blast 'em.

So now, as aforesaid, we appeal to our friends all over this country—thousands of them—to send the amount of their arrearages and as much in advance as they have been behind, to sort of even things up and turn about in fair play, as it were. A year's subscription from each one whose time has expired will make us easy—very easy—but if we can't have that then let us have what you can spare, and we will "grin and bear it" until you get the balance. The amounts are small individually and easily raised, but to us they collectively mean a good deal—just the difference between being even with the world and being unpleasantly behind.

The disciples of a certain philosopher, one day missing their teacher from his accustomed place in the midst of them, sought him at his unpretentious lodgings, where they discovered that he was suffering from the lack of a Square Meal. Of course they hastened to provide him with all that the inner sinner could desire, but he nevertheless took occasion to jab them with a moral pointed by the event. "Know, then" (said he), "that in order that you may permanently enjoy the light of a lamp, it is necessary occasionally to replenish the Oil."

Delinquents who renew at once will be spared the moral which their remissness might tempt us to draw.

The third volume of Moncure D. Conway's edition of the collected works of Thomas Paine is now on sale. Price, $2.50.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS)

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

A Suggestion.

NEW YORK, April 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see it is in contemplation by the friends of Thomas Paine to commemorate his memory at the monument at New Rochelle on May 30th—Decoration day. I would propose that a resolution be offered on that occasion that those present who feel disposed to have their names entered on a list have an opportunity to do so. It will bring us more together and help make us acquainted with each other. I found at the last year's meeting that the women were more enthusiastic for Freethought than many of the men.

CONNOQUENESING, PA., April 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6—two years' subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $1 for Paine's "Age of Reason," to be sent to the inclosed addresses. That is a grand plan for missionary work. I have had Paine's "Age of Reason" going the rounds for years. It is a good eye-opener. I have been confined to my room all fall and winter, but I hope I shall be able to get out as soon as the weather gets warmer. I am just through reading "Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen Gardener, which ought to be in every Freethinker's possession.

The heathen without outeness
Bows down to wood and stone,
The priest in his astuteness
Would make this world his own.
And so all heathen nations
The mission fiends have slain,
And made a king creator—
A despot for to reign.

What Say You, Wealthy Freethinkers?

CASTALIA, S. D., April 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed article is clipped from a recent issue of the Yankton (S. D.) Daily Press and Dakotan. Perhaps you would care to give it space in your columns, or comment upon it.

Yours respectfully, G. L. KIRK.

H. W. White, the well known mechanical inventor of this city, has just announced to the public a philanthropic plan, which he has had in mind for a long period of years. He wants to endow an educational institution to the extent of about $10,000, and he wants some active person or persons to offer him some encouragement within two years. He is growing old and feels that he would like to get his affairs into first-class condition before he is called upon to lay down the burdens of life. Here is Mr. White's proposition:

"I own a tract of forty acres of the finest land in Yankton county, lying just west or across the road from the state insane hospital. It rises gently from all sides toward the center and terminates in one of the most attractive building sites in the country. From this point an excellent view of the country for miles around is obtainable and on that eminence I want to see an educational building erected.

"I also have one of the finest cabinets of mineral specimens, curios, and ornithological specimens in the United States, the result of years of work in their collection and the expenditure of thousands of dollars.

"I propose to give to a school which I shall describe shortly this tract of land and this cabinet, provided a fund of from $75,000 to $100,000, or enough of it to assure the success of the undertaking, is raised within two years. This school shall be established for the education of the orphan children of drunkards. It must be absolutely non-sectarian, no copy of the Bible must be permitted within its walls, and only persons who are non-sectarian in every respect will be employed as teachers. The children will learn of and about God otherwise than through the Bible or its adherents. It shall be the purpose of the school to give children a good practical business education, to instruct them in the natural laws, in chemistry, astronomy, and philosophy, hygiene, physiology, and anatomy. The arts and sciences may be taught in their mechanical branches in order to make the school as nearly self-sustaining as possible, and trades shall be taught such boys as develop a talent for anything in that direction. To such a school I am willing to give the building site and my cabinet of specimens.

"I am prompted to do this," continued Mr. White, "by the experiences of my life. I know the value of an education because I never had one. Not one day did I ever spend in school, because I had no one to stand the expense of my schooling. To children so situated the school that I have described would be of inestimable value and would help to make true and upright citizens of many children who go to the dogs because they are compelled to by poverty. For the children of drunkards I make this offer."

Mr. Stevens's Wanderings.

EVANSVILLE, IND., April 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Stevens and myself left Chicago the middle of January and took up our residence at Indianapolis with Mrs. Dr. J. R. Monroe, widow of the lamented Liberal editor. After enjoying (?) the eccentricities of the thermometer in the Hoosier capital for seven weeks, we concluded to take a tour further South, Mrs. Monroe accompanying us to her old home, Seymour, Ind., where we were hospitably entertained by her staunch friends, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Kling. The Klings are progressive and aggressive Liberals of refinement, wealth, and culture. Their only daughter is the wife of Manager Dunbar, of the Gibson House, Cincinnati. Mr. Kling early evolved from Hebraic formalism into thoroughly materialistic philosophy. I have seldom met a better conversationalist or a person more profoundly read. In Liberal thought Mrs. Kling is her husband's alter ego.

From Seymour we journeyed to Louisville, Ky., famous for varied brands of the beverage that cheers and more often inebriates, for pretty girls, chattering negroes, wretched water, and most uninviting smoke.

While in Louisville we made two calls on Dr. and Mrs. W. L. Carter, a prominent physician and still more prominent as a Liberal. Mr. and Mrs. Carter are "to the manner born," both natives of this state, and their decidedly Southern accent was a charming change to our ears. Notwithstanding being the leading Liberal, I am pleased that the doctor's professional services are as much in demand as though he believed in forty gods. Singularly enough, his residence is only two squares from the cemetery. However, that is merely a coincidence which the doctor will pardon me for mentioning. Cave Hill is the most beautifully situated city of the dead in the United States. Its naturally romantic beauty is heightened by artistic mausoleums, stately monoliths, fluted tombs, and flower-covered urns. For flowers were abundant even before April. If ever there was a spot that looked inviting enough for one to die to remain there, I think it is Cave Hill. Irresistibly dropped into monolog and repeated—

Can storied urn, or animated bust,
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

A trip up the Ohio river to Cincinnati on the steamer Congo is a languid, lazy style of traveling to which I can scarcely accustom myself.

Here hills and vales, the woodland and the plain,
Here earth and water seem to strive again.

Could those hills and banks but repeat the tragedies that must have occurred when the white man struggled to wrest this fair land from the red; or later the deeds of river desperadoes, or give us a glimpse of the many steamboat explosions and disasters that took place along this tawny-colored stream; coming still closer, the efforts of the fugitive slaves who struggled to cross this barrier to freedom, thence to be carried through the "underground railroad" to Canada. Then the war period looms up to our mental vision, with hostile hosts patrolling either bank, the dash of raiders, the rattle of musketry from ambush; the cotton-bales piled around to protect the pilot-houses, and other exciting scenes. The Ohio river is rich in reminiscence.

Here is Lawrenceburgh, where H. W. Beecher commenced his ministrations in a little log church, long before he labored to "knock the bottom out of hell," and where his sister, Harriet Beecher Stowe, wrote that flamboyant book, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," her characters being taken, it is said, from just across the river in Shelbyville, Ky. Outside its sickly religious sentiment it was a great torch of freedom.

In Cincinnati I call on Dr. E. S. McLeod and George Light—the beacons of the Ohio Liberal Society. Here we busied ourselves sight-seeing for two days, the Zoological Gardens being one point of interest. Cincinnati can boast the nearest approach to the London "Zoo" it has been my privilege to see. We missed from the monkey house the familiar Milesian countenances of Mr. and Mrs. Rooney, who we believe have passed to the summer-land of monkeydom. The vari-colored feathery tribes from all climes make a surpassingly gorgeous display.

Next morning Mr. Light called at our hotel and took us on a visit to Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, who has won golden opinions in the Ohio metropolis. Mrs. Krekel accompanied us on a hasty visit to the Academy of Arts in Eden Park. Here are many masterly works of art in marble and in oil. As we enter, Benjamin West's great work greets our sight, "Jesus riding on an Ass into Jerusalem." As I have previously remarked, the eyes and ears of that jackass express about all the intelligence depicted in the picture. Despite the worldly mind of Porkopolis, she cherishes a larger quantity of Madonnas and angels, on canvas, than is consistent with nineteenth century ideas. However, we cannot particularize, as our time is short, so we bid a regretful adieu to Eden and return to Louisville, thence to Evansville, Ind., where Chainey and Putnam once labored before leaving the Unitarian pulpit. On my way to Paducah, Ky., I wished I had time to run up the Cumberland river to Golden Pond, where I could greet a good many Liberals. Kentucky makes it a criminal offense to laugh in church, so that a Kentucky Freethinker must perforce possess what we denominate "sand."

What Is in Store for Us.

COLFAX, WASH., April 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for renewal of my father's subscription for one year. We have been constant readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for over four years, and I can say that it is the greatest paper that I ever saw in my time; we could not do without it.

I was greatly amused at Mr. John Peck's article in the issue of March 30th, entitled "New Genesis," or a description of creation; some people think it horrid, but I think it great, and I fully agree with Mr. Peck, but I am sorry that he omitted saying anything of those pesky Bible-backed howlers going round and creating excitement to fool the weak-minded people; their heads seem filled to the utmost capacity with the same material of which their great God made the earth and planets, which was "nothing," just simply nothing, that was all.

We had a Methodist Episcopal revival in our town last winter in which their good minister converted and saved the souls of perhaps something over a hundred, and during this time they went round on the streets begging for money, which they claimed was for the benefit of their Lord and master, and they came to a Chinese laundryman and asked him for fifty cents. This was the heathen's reply: "G—d, Gele-Clist, what for? He alle time bloke and likee four-bitty."

I see by the papers that the women and church people are getting very nice about the Sunday laws and the way that different classes of people wear their clothes in

New York and other states. I believe that if we do not do something to check them the churches will run the business of our United States, and that it will not be a very long time until they will compel us—the supposedly free people of the great United States of America—to sit upon that seat of Sunday rest.

It is time that our Senators and Congressmen and our state legislators should be working hard for that liberty for which our forefathers fought some hundred years ago. And it will not be long until the church women will have laws passed so as to compel people who have horses to have a big cover made of some kind of cloth to conceal them while driving on the public highways, for fear that the appearance in their natural state would create immoral thoughts.

Yours for truth and liberty,

GEO. W. HULL.

The Origin of Jehovah.

PALMER, MASS., April 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In "Observations" of April 20th I find the following, in effect: "That the higher critics inform us that the religion of the Hebrews was a motley polytheism; that they believed in sacred stones and trees," etc. Now, does this apply to a time before the Bible's God was introduced to them, or after? If before, then the Bible writers are not responsible for it, any more than they are for the Hebrews' misfortune of being apes once upon a time, if Darwin is right; and if after, we cannot blame them for David's invocations to the Baals, any more than for his committing adultery. They have said, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," and they have said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." Can we confound the Bible God with idols, Molech, Baals, etc., while we see them recommend the one and condemn the others?

The Hebrew grammar tells us that all nouns are accepted as masculine or feminine only when their genders are strictly adhered to throughout the Bible, but those nouns which are treated in the Bible as sometimes masculine and then again feminine, are neuter, and can be written either way, as one may please. The Hebrew has no word for the pronoun "it." Ruah is neuter, and treated in Genesis as feminine; therefore, when translating the words singly and separately the word merahsefeth cannot be translated otherwise than "she moves," although, when translating the whole sentence into the English sense, it reads, "It moved."

The Hebrew word for nation is Goy, singular; for nations, Goyim, plural. In Deut. iv, 7, the passage in question, the word "Goy" is used; therefore, "Him," and not "Them."

I am aware of the difficulty of explaining to an English scholar the twisting and turning, the meaning and fine shades of meaning, of the Hebrew language and its grammar, but it is unavoidable, and perhaps no harder than to translate from the French into English. The following may help to illustrate how hard it is to convey the true sense from one language to another. A Frenchman who wished to compliment an English lady on her beautiful complexion said, in all sincerity, "Madam, you have a beautiful leather," meaning, of course, skin. He was not wrong—his Ollendorff told him so, yet the lady thought otherwise and the company enjoyed a hearty laugh.

I will now endeavor, in my poor and simple way, to explain the passage in Genesis, "Behold, the man has become as one of us." According to our ideas regarding the Bible, we have stripped that book of its divinity, so that it is left to us in its full nakedness to admire its good parts, and despise its deformities. Thus investigating it, we find that the book was written by men. That they strove to introduce a better god of their own production, and one god only, it is very reasonable to believe, considering the number of gods that were then worshiped. Whether they succeeded or not, makes no difference. We are investigating their intentions, which were good. But alas! their ignorance led them astray, and they have made a caricature of him. We are satisfied that they knew nothing of science, and that they had no idea of cause and effect. They had never heard of Galileo; and so, when they saw the dawn of day, long before the sun appeared; when they saw the twilight of eve long after the sun disappeared, they thought that light was independent of the sun; and so their god made light on the first day of creation, and the sun on the fourth day for the purpose of dividing the light from the dark (before, it must have been mixed). Not knowing of any other worlds besides their own, and having no use for any, they called the stars lamps, which were put there for their sole benefit, and of course their god said it was good. There is not a single deed or word, recorded and attributed to their god, that can be regarded as befitting a being superior to man. He is the creation of their own imagination, and upon him are reflected their ignorance, their superstition, and their passions. His work was after their plan; his words, their utterances. We can also safely assert that at the time when the first chapter of Genesis was written there was more than one man in the world; so God, their speaking-tube, so to speak, used the words, "like us," as they would have done. Had there been but one man, and he the biographer of this god, the pronoun us, or the expression "one of us," would never have been used by either the man directly, or through his instrument, God.

There are many theories regarding the time when the book of Genesis was written, and when the one-god theory was first advanced, but none of them is authentic. But taking all the opinions and various theories into consideration, we may form an opinion of our own. And why not? Are we not better fitted for the task, after using the knowledge of our historians, their investigations and researches? Now, in following that, I am inclined to think that the Bible was written long after the one-god idea was conceived by man, and that Moses, the priests, and the prophets had a clear conception of it. The celebrated German poet, Schiller, in his "Mission of Moses," tells us that the wise men in Egypt had a sort of a Masonic fraternity, and were engaged in the search for more light and in the teaching of one god; and being in danger of persecution by the populace for so doing, they met on the mountains and in caves. Into these trysting-places Moses was admitted. There he inhaled, for the first time, a purer atmosphere. There the bandage of idolatry was lifted from his eyes, and he beheld the dazzling light of their teaching.

Now, in putting this theory of Schiller, and many others, together, I infer that they had repudiated the gods and idols, which were worshiped then, and substituted one that was better. That one had no appellation. That mysterious ruling agency they could not name, neither could their pupil, Moses. We know the state of perplexity he was in. How could he introduce a new deity to the Israelites, and himself not knowing the name. Ponder as much as he would, he could come to no better conclusion than to name him "Ehyeh," I am. This is the starting-point for the word Jehovah, pronounced in Hebrew Yehovah. That word, and the word "Ehyeh," are identical, and can be recognized by a Hebrew scholar, Yehovah being a composite word from the words Hoyoh, Hoveh. V. Yihyeh is Masoretic, and the authority cannot be traced, nor is it necessary. All these words can be recognized as springing from one and the same origin. A glance at the Century Dictionary, though treating the word "Jehovah" incompletely, will, perhaps, dispel the suspicion that mine is a fanciful definition. MOREH NEBUCHIM.

See What Live Workers Can Do.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: "Paine's Great Works Complete," the last of those books I ordered some time ago, duly arrived, and I am well pleased. Just now I am hunting for new subscribers, as I would like to secure your much-spoken-of "Pictorial Text-Book."

Inclosed clippings will show that a few of us, and very few at that, I regret to say, are doing what little we can, to defend mental liberty, and though frequently our communications are rejected, we try again, and thus occasionally are given a hearing in our local newspapers, of which the Times-Democrat seems to be the most liberal.

Quite a discussion took place in that paper on the "Personal Devil of Christianity." My letter was rejected, because the editor says communications on that subject came in so plentifully that he was compelled to return a dozen, not because they were not interesting, but because such discussions are unending, and after having given both sides a fair hearing, two or three times, he had to stop it. But it is a good sign to hear that dozens of letters came pouring in to the paper. Thus Mr. Bryan and our friend D. W. Groh gave the devil a rolling in the Times-Democrat. In the States I roasted Father Power, of the Jesuit's church, on his "Confessional" sermon, and received a weak reply the next day, to which I again replied the following day; while another party (I do not recollect his name just now) criticized Archbishop Janssens on his "Matrimony" sermon in the columns of the Picayune. I hunted up this gentleman's address in the directory, and promptly sent him some copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Independent Pulpit. Whenever I mail copies this way, I use THE TRUTH SEEKER's wrappers with my tag on, so that they may know from whom they come. My good friend, Mr. Bryan, with whom I got acquainted through your excellent paper, and who subscribes for some eight or ten Freethought publications, frequently distributes bundles of them at the Spiritualists' meetings. We have no doubt all of this will do some good.

I have this morning also sent two TRUTH SEEKERS to the Times-Democrat, calling attention to the "Sabbath" law editorials.

Do you know that last Friday—goody-goody Friday—my wife being unable to get fresh meat in the market, we had to be satisfied with a chicken, and for this terrible crime were severely criticised by our good Christian neighbors! But it tasted so good, nevertheless, that all but the bones were "out of sight" within half an hour. Some lady asked our eight-year-old boy if he did not know it was a "fast-day," to which he replied that it would be time enough to fast when he had nothing to eat. Next year he will join Miss Wixon's corps and also subscribe for The Little Freethinker. Yours fraternally,

ERWIN AUFFURTH.

April 18, 1895.

P. S. Here is new subscriber No. 1. Find name and address on card. The gentleman dropped in to express his approval of my letter to States, published a few days since; he also read my communication on Church Taxation (almost a column) published in the Picayune some time ago, and was well pleased. He is a wide-awake and prosperous business man and manager of one of the largest door, sash, and blind factories in this city. He also attended Colonel Ingersoll's lecture here about two months ago, but, with many others, regretted very much that the Colonel did not select one of his religious lectures instead of "Shakspeare." I had a hearty handshake with the Colonel, and, like many others, expressed the hope that he would return in the near future to deliver another lecture.

I have good hopes of sending another subscriber within the next few weeks.

THE DEVIL AND THE BIBLE.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 1, 1895.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES-DEMOCRAT: In your issue of March 28, "an orthodox minister," answering S. S. Bryan's communication on the "Personal Devil," asserts that "a noted minister," who said that nobody any longer believed in the devil of Christianity, that it was only a "huge joke," must have been a Unitarian or a Universalist. But upon inquiry I am informed that he was neither one nor the other—another proof that even in the orthodox church we can see progress. After stating that even those who repudiate the idea of a personal devil nevertheless admit that scripture teaches it, he concludes: "The question then is no longer whether or not there is a personal devil, but whether or not the Bible is true and whether its teachings can be relied on—upon that question, however, I do not propose to enter."

So, though the real question is, Is the Bible true and can it be relied on? yet "an orthodox minister" wishes not to enter upon this fundamental question. To decline to do so would signify the weakness of the reverend gentleman's case, but I should consider it his duty, as an agent of God, to enter upon this question and substantiate the truth and reliability of the Bible, and thus convince the doubters of their mistaken views, and cause them to return to the true faith. But so long as the reverend gentleman insists on remaining silent on this subject, the doubters will, of course, remain doubters. "Doubt leads to investigation, investigation to truth—the enemy of all superstition," says a prominent Agnostic (doubter). Therefore, as investigation cannot injure anything built on the foundation of truth, "an orthodox minister" should not hesitate a moment to enter into the discussion of the truth and reliability of the Bible, and if successful in proving this, substantiate the existence of the devil. This proven, he would convert many doubters and save them from an unpleasant future (hell), which place must also exist if the Bible is true and reliable.

According to my views, I am destined to become an inmate of this latter place, for I truly believe—and shall continue to believe—unless "an orthodox minister" or someone else convinces me differently—that the Bible cannot be relied on; that its geology is wrong; its astronomy ditto; that the earth is no longer flat, no longer stationary; that the sun no longer revolves around the earth; that the sun is no longer pushed back ten degrees; that man was not completed in a jiffy only a few thousand years ago; that Cain could never have gone into the land of Nod to take unto himself a wife, as his parents were the only ones living then; that Jonah never established a temporary boarding and lodging house in a whale's belly; that the miracles of the Old and New Testaments were never performed—that a stick never turned into a serpent, or vice versa; that an ass never spoke Sanscrit, Greek or Hebrew; that the waters never parted as though they were walls and let people pass through without getting their feet wet; that the dead never arose from their graves, etc., etc., all of which goes to show that the writers of the Bible were ignorant as to the laws of nature, astronomy, geology, and lacked other scientific knowledge. As to its moral precepts, I admit it contains some good teachings; some unreasonable and absurd, and some so bad that "an orthodox minister" would not read it to his congregation or to his family. And as to contradictions, we find them by the score. Permit me just to mention a few: According to Gen. i, 31, God is satisfied with his works; according to Gen. vi, 6, God is dissatisfied with his works. According to Ex. xxxiii, 23; Ex. xxxiii, 11; Gen. xii, 9, 10; Gen. xxxii, 30; Is. vi, 1; Ex. xxiv, 9, 10, 11, God is seen and heard; according to John v, 37; Ex. xxxiii, 20; 1 Tim. vi, 16, God is invisible and cannot be heard.

According to some passages, God is changeable; according to others, God is unchangeable; according to Mark xv, 25, Jesus was crucified at the third hour; according to John xix, 14, 15, he was not crucified until the sixth hour. According to Mat. xxvii, 5, Judas hanged himself; according to Acts i, 18, he fell and burst asunder, etc., etc.

As, then, the Bible contains mistakes, contradictions, myths, blunders, and absurdities, it is not possible that an infinitesimal being could be connected with it; but that it was written by finite beings, by men of very limited knowledge, whose mistaken ideas got the best of them, is indubitable. So the Bible is unreliable.

The day is fast approaching when these horrible teachings concerning a devil and an eternal hell will be considered as relics of a superstitious age. As soon as people resort to reason instead of superstition, hell will run short of fuel, and when this occurs, the devil will die a natural death; the doubter, the investigator, will be proud of being accused of this murder—reason, not the sword, having been his weapon. Universal Mental Liberty will then reign supreme. Respectfully,

ERWIN AUFFURTH.

Mortuary—Cassius M. Lazenby.

LEMORE, CAL., April 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It is with sorrow that I write you that my brother, C. M. Lazenby, has passed away. He was a consistent Liberal. For the last three years he has been an invalid and suffered untold pain, but was conscious up to the very last. His wife was grieving over him, and he told her not to grieve, as he was but going to sleep, and it seemed so, for he passed away just like one dropping into slumber. He said he had no fear of death, and his only regrets were for his family. His funeral was as nearly secular as it was possible to have it here, as there is no secular organization. Although many church members took part in the service, it was very good. I remain, with best wishes,

Yours, EDWARD LAZENBY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Patient With the Living.

Sweet friend, when thou and I are gone
Beyond earth's weary labor,
When small shall be our need of grace
From comrade or from neighbor,
Past all the strife, the toil, the care,
And done with all the sighing,
What tender ruth shall we have gained,
Alas! by simply dying!

Then lips too chary of their praise
Will tell our merits over,
And eyes too swift our faults to see
Shall no defect discover.
Then hands that would not lift a stone
Where stones were thick to cumber
Our steep hill path will scatter flowers
Above our pillowed slumber.

Sweet friend, perchance both thou and I,
Ere love is past forgiving,
Should take the earnest lesson home—
Be patient with the living.
To-day's repressed rebuke may save
Our blinding tears to-morrow;
Then patience—e'en when keenest edge
May whet a nameless sorrow.

'Tis easy to be gentle when Death's silence shames our clamor;
And easy to discern the best
Through memory's mystic glamour;
But wise it were for thee and me,
Ere love is past forgiving,
To take the tender lesson home—
Be patient with the living.

Auntie Bright's Lectures.

II.—ETHICS.

"O Walter, Walter!" cried Madge to her brother, a few weeks after Auntie Bright's last narrative. "Do come at once. Auntie is going to tell us another story."

Walter was three years older than his sister, but his boyish love for romance was equally enthusiastic. Eagerly he bounded into the sitting-room, where dear, delightful Auntie Bright sat.

"I fear the stories have more attraction than my poor endeavors at pointing out a moral or illustrating an important fact," she remonstrated. "Oh, no, no!" her young auditors declared, while Walter added, "I have become an adept in logic." "And I," rejoined Madge, not to be outdone, "understand it perfectly."

Auntie Bright laughed merrily. "Beware," she said, "or a terrible retribution may await you, as it did the poor Eastern goldsmith, for being dishonest."

"O Auntie!" exclaimed Madge, with a deep-drawn breath of blissful anticipation.

"Well, said Auntie Bright. "But first I want Walter to tell me what he understands by Ethics."

"The science of moral conduct," he answered promptly.

"Good," said Auntie. "And now, can studious Madge tell what she understands by conscience?"

Madge thought a moment. "It is a sense of divining moral obligation," she said.

"Very good," cried pleased Auntie Bright. "Now, my dear children, you shall have your story; after a prosy little preamble of my own."

"People have asserted—and people who ought to know—that conscience, the realization of moral obligation, grounded upon fear, will eventually become conscience grounded upon spontaneous approval."

"I do not believe it!" cried Madge, impulsively.

"Why not?" asked Auntie Bright, who loved to draw her pupils out.

"Because fear is not acquiescence but subjection. Not intelligent acquiescence, I mean. Who ever knew a good code of morality to result from the 'fear o' hell, and the hangman's whip?'"

"Sissy, dear! the universal code of morality, accepted by an enlightened nation, is just that, and naught else," argued Walter, half teasingly, half earnestly.

"I said a good code, Wallie," retorted Madge, giving him the playful name she had called him in childhood.

"Conscience is a growth," interposed Auntie Bright, "and while Madge is perfectly right in her argument, nevertheless a code of morals is still the single sentiment of one, accepted by a nation. Mohammedan morality came from Mohammed; Confucius was the moral legislator of the Chinese. Christian morality is guided by teachings of the Bible. And subjection to authority was the ruling spirit of each. Its peculiarity is marked by the absence of logic and acceptance of superstitious emotion. And the Eastern legend I am about to relate is illustrative of that."

In the flowery land of Persia there once lived a skillful goldsmith and a renowned painter. They were steadfast friends, and mutually resolved to be constant to each other. With this understanding they went upon a journey. Arriving at a monastery they readily obtained hospitality, and the monks, though not of Mohammedan faith, placed so much confidence in the guests as to tell them where were concealed valuable gold and silver images. With a base abuse of trust reposed in them, the artists stole the images and fled to a country of the Islamites, where they took up their abode. Now these comrades, each knowing the other to be guilty of theft, became jealous of the treasure, and finally, to settle a dispute, agreed to put the treasures in a box, and take therefrom only a stated amount that their necessities required. The goldsmith had now married a very amiable lady, and was the happy father of two little boys, who were the pride and joy of their parents' hearts. But the goldsmith's expenses were necessarily increased, and in a moment of weakness, he opened the cherished box, taking therefrom one-half of the gold and silver, which he concealed in his own home.

The painter soon discovered the theft. He questioned the goldsmith about it, but the latter strenuously denied all knowledge of the robbery. But the painter was shrewd. He suspected his friend, and set about finding a way to force the unhappy man to confess. And being particularly crafty he took the most effective way to do so—appealing to parental love.

The painter owned two little tame bears, that, curiously enough, resembled the goldsmith's children in height and playful antics. He also made a figure of wood to resemble the goldsmith. This he taught the bears to caress in their clumsy fashion, and eat the food he placed in the figure's hand. After having succeeded so far, he invited the goldsmith's family to his home. They accepted; and the painter seized the first opportunity to lock up the little boys where their father would not be apt to find them. Soon the goldsmith inquired for his children. The painter appeared greatly distressed.

"A strange thing has happened, my friend, which I fear will cause you grave sorrow."

"Oh, tell me what it is! I hope nothing has happened to the lads."

"Indeed, there has."

"What?"

"They have become changed."

"How?"

"Into two little bears."

"Impossible!"

"Yes; while they were running about, all at once each turned into a little bear! Look out of the window into the yard. There they go now."

In the east people are very superstitious, and a man with a guilty conscience, as I mentioned before, is influenced largely by emotion. When the goldsmith saw the bears he believed what the painter said was true. He could only articulate, "Why do you think this has happened?"

The painter answered, "I think it must have been on account of some great sin. Is their mother a good woman?"

"One of the best."

"Have you nothing on your own conscience?"

"Nothing," answered the goldsmith, choking.

"There they go," said the painter; "just see them." The goldsmith covered his eyes to shut out the horrible sight.

"I will take this case to the cadi," he said.

"I will go with you," said the painter.

The cadi heard their story with astonishment. "Produce the bears," he said.

The painter did so, and proved the story by the instant recognition the bears had for the goldsmith. The painter having cunningly kept them hungry, they climbed up the goldsmith's legs and licked his hands as they had done the image.

The cadi was astounded. The goldsmith stammered:

"Oh, my poor little b-boys-bears." Not knowing whether they were boys or bears, he cried out in grief and remorse, "I am the thief. I stole the images."

The painter appeared greatly astonished. Enjoining the goldsmith to pray for pardon, he led away the bears. The unhappy man did so with many groans, and soon the painter appeared leading the two little boys.

"Allah be praised!" cried the goldsmith.

The cadi, less credulous, privately asked the painter for an explanation.

He gave the whole story; and the cadi, lost in admiration for his ingenuity, forgot the moral points and praised him heartily for his discernment.

Auntie Bright's pleasant voice ceased here, but her young auditors gave her a vote of thanks in their own original way, Madge consenting to leave only on the promise of another story soon.

IDA BALLOU.

Only One Fault.

I was riding through a country town in Vermont, when I noticed a concourse of people in a church-yard, encircling an open grave.

It was a warm day and I had ridden ten miles; so I drew the rein under some trees, to allow the horse to rest.

Presently a villager came toward me, and I said: "There is a funeral to-day in your town."

"Yes—Stephen. He was one of the largest-hearted men I ever knew. He had great abilities. We sent him to the legislature three times. They thought of nominating him for governor. But," he added sadly, "Stephen had only one fault."

I made no answer. I was tired, and watched the people disperse, leaving the sexton to his solitary work. He said:

"A very generous man, Stephen was. Always visited the sick. The old people all liked him. Even the children used to follow him on the streets."

"A good man, indeed," I said indifferently.

"Yes, he had only one fault."

"What was that?" I asked.

"Only intemperance."

"Did it harm him?"

"Yes, somewhat. He didn't seem to have any power to resist it at last. He got behindhand and had to mortgage his farm, and finally he had to sell it. His wife died on account of the reverse—kind of crushed, disappointed. Then his children turned out badly. His intemperance seemed to mortify them, and take away their spirit. He had to leave politics; 'twouldn't do, you see. Then we had to set him aside from the church; and at last his habits brought on paralysis, and we had to take him to the poorhouse. He died there—only forty-five. Poor man, he had only one fault."

"Only one fault!" The ship had only one leak, but it sank.

"Only one fault!" The temple had but one decaying pillar, but it fell.

"Only one fault!" Home gone, wife lost, family ruined, honor forfeited, social and religious privileges abandoned; broken health, poverty, paralysis, and the poorhouse.

One fault, only one!

The Bishop and the Caterpillar.

A HUMOROUS READING.

The Bishop sat in the schoolmaster's chair: The Rector and curates two were there, The Doctor, the Squire, the heads of the choir, And the Gentry around of high degree, A highly distinguished company; For the bishop was greatly beloved in his see!

And there below
A goodly show,
Their faces with soap and with pleasure aglow,
Sat the dear little school children, row upon row.

I think I have read,
Or at least heard it said,
"Boys are always in mischief, unless they're in bed."

I put it to you,
I don't say it's true,
But if you should ask for my own private view,
I should answer at once, without further ado,
"I don't think a boy can be trusted to keep

From mischief in bed—unless he's asleep!"
But the schoolmaster's eye had a magic spell,
And the boys were behaving remarkably well—

For boys, and the girls—but 'tis needless to say
Their conduct was perfect in every way;
For I'm sure 'tis well known in all ranks of society,
That girls always behave with the utmost propriety.

Now the Bishop arises and waves his hand,
And the children prepared for his questions stand;
With admiring eyes his form they scan:
He was a remarkably fine-looking man!
With dignified mien and solemn look
He slowly opened his ponderous book,
And proceeded at once the knowledge to try
Of those nice little children standing by.

Each child knew its name,
And who gave it the same,
And all the rest of the questions profound
Which his Lordship was pleased to the school to propound.
They knew the date when the Queen was crowned,
And the number of pence which make up a pound;
And the oceans and seas which our island bound;
And the Bishop, at last, completely astound—

Ed, cried
In a tone of pride,
"You bright little dears, no questions can trouble you,
You've spelled knife with a k, and wrong with a w,

"And now that my pleasing task's at an end,
I trust you will make of me a friend;
You've answered my questions, and 'tis but fair
That I in replying should take a share;
So if there is aught you would like to know,
Pray ask me about it before I go.
So do not feel

Afraid or shy
But boldly try,
Which is the cleverer, you or I?"

Thus amusement with learning judiciously blending,
His Lordship made of his speech an ending,
And a murmur went round of "How condescending!"

But one bright little boy didn't care a jot
If his Lordship were condescending or not;

For with scarce a pause
For the sound of applause,
He raised his head,
And abruptly said—

"How many legs has a caterpillar got?"
Now, the Bishop was a learned man.
Bishops always were since the race began,
But his knowledge in that particular line
Was less than yours, and no greater than mine;

And, except that he knew the creature could crawl,
He knew nothing about its legs at all—
Whether the number were great or small,
One hundred, or five, or sixty, or six,
So he felt in a "pretty considerable fix!"
But, resolving his ignorance to hide,
In measured tones he thus replied:

"The caterpillar, my dear little boy,
Is an emblem of life and a vision of joy!
It bursts from its shell on a bright green leaf,
It knows no care, and it feels no grief."

Then he turned to the Rector and whispered low,
"Mr. Rector, how many? You surely must know."

But the Rector gravely shook his head,

He hadn't the faintest idea, he said.
So the Bishop turned to the class again,
And in tones paternal took up the strain:
"The caterpillar, dear children, see,
On its bright green leaf from care lives
free,
And it eats, and eats, and grows bigger and bigger
(Perhaps the Curates can state the figure?)"
But the Curates couldn't; the Bishop went on,
Though he felt that another chance was gone.
"So it eats, and eats, and it grows and grows
(Just ask the Schoolmaster if he knows)."
But the Schoolmaster said that that kind of knowledge
Was not the sort that he learned at college.
"And when it has eaten enough, then soon
It spins for itself a soft cocoon,
And then it becomes a chrysalis—
I wonder which child can spell me this.
'Tis rather a difficult word to spell—
(Just ask the Schoolmistress if she can tell)."
But the Schoolmistress said, as she shook her brown curls,
"She considered such things were not proper for girls."
The word was spelled, and spelled quite right,
Those nice little boys were so awfully bright!
And the Bishop began to get into a fright,
His face grew red—it was formerly white—
And the hair on his head stood nearly upright;
He was almost inclined to take refuge in flight,
But he thought that would be too shocking a sight.
He was at his wits' end—nearly—not quite,
For the Pupil Teachers caught his eye.
He thought they might know—at least he would try—
Then he anxiously waited for their reply;
But the Pupil Teachers enjoyed the fun,
And they wouldn't hav told if they could hav done.
So he said to the Beadle, "Go down the street,
And stop all the people you chance to meet,
I don't care who,
Anyone will do;
Ask any or all,
Great or small,
Short or tall, it matters not—
How many legs has a caterpillar got?"
The Beadle bowed, and was off like a shot.
Now the Bishop again put on a smile,
To the children, who had been waiting meanwhile.
"The caterpillar is doomed to sleep
For months—a slumber long and deep,
Brown and dead,
It looks, 'tis said,
It never even requires to be fed;
And, except that sometimes it waggles its head,
Your utmost efforts would surely fail,
To distinguish the creature's head from its tail!"
"But one morning in spring,
When the birds loudly sing,
And the earth is gay with blossoming;
When the violets blue,
Are wet with dew,
And the sky wears the sweetest cerulean hue!
When on all is seen
The brightest sheen—
When the daisies are white, and the grass is green;
Then the chrysalis breaks,
The insect awakes—
To the realms of air its way it takes:
It did not die,
It soars on high,
A bright and a beauteous butterfly!"
Here he paused and wiped a tear from his eye;
The Beadle was quietly standing by,
And perceiving the lecture had reached its close,
Whispered, softly and sadly, "Nobody knows!"
The Bishop saw his last hope was vain,
But to make the best of it he was fain,
So he added, "Dear children, we ever should be Prepared to learn from all we see,
And beautiful thoughts of home and joy
Fill the heart, I know, of each girl and boy!
Now, ponder on these, and you will not care
To know the exact allotted share
Of legs the creature possessed at its birth.
When it crawled a mean worm on this lowly earth.
Yet, if you know it, you now may tell,
Your answers so far hav pleased me well."
Then he looked around with benignant eye,
Nor long did he wait for the reply,
For the bright little boy, with countenance gay,
Said, "Six, for I counted them yesterday!"
MORAL,
To all who hav children under their care,
Of one or two things I would pray you beware—

Don't let them go in for examination,
Unless you hav given them due preparation,
Or the questions asked with the kindest intention,
May be rather a strain on their powers of invention.
Don't pretend you know everything under the sun.
Though your school days are ended and theirs but begun,
But honestly say, when the case is so
"This thing, my dear children, I really don't know;"
For the children must learn, either slower or speedier,
That you're not a walking Encyclopaedia!

THE BETTER WORLD
A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE
By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.
For I dipt into the future, far as human eye can see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless;
where women are the stronger sex,
where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."
There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Gems of Thought.

To some men conscience is another word for intolerance.—Dayton Republican.

OF gratitude as of humanity, the ultimate root is sympathy.—Herbert Spencer

GREATNESS is not the gift of majorities; it cannot be thrust upon any man; men cannot give it to another; they can give place and power, but not greatness. The place does not make the man, nor the scepter the king. Greatness is from within.—Ingersoll.

THERE is no counting with certainty on the justice of men who are capable of fashioning and worshipping an unjust divinity; nor on their humanity so long as they incorporate inhuman motives in their most sacred dogmas; nor on their reasonableness while they rigorously decline to accept reason as a test of truth.—John Morley.

INGERSOLL but voices the future in his protest against the revival of the whipping-post. The Press sneers at those who are promptly vocal with their pretty "ready-made" phrases in tribute to liberty and civilization. This is a stripe upon Ingersoll's back. But it is unworthy of the Press. The whip cuts the hand that wields it. The protest against barbarity is not half a protest, uttered for a victim, but a voice raised out of respect for those who suffer themselves to entertain feelings of revenge and retaliation. Restraint should be spiritual. It should carry a torch, not a club.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE church is not civilized. It never will be civilized. It is to-day the same savage power it ever was, the same wild beast of destruction. It is the eternal foe of liberty. It is a manifold and subtle power. It is imbedded in the ignorance and superstition of the race. It loves darkness rather than light. It moves in the shadow of conspiracy. It may have music and art and the embellishments of civilization; but these do not change its nature. They only cover over and help to make us forget its cruelty and injustice. Let us learn the lessons of history and be watchful for the priceless inheritance of liberty. Never was there a grander opportunity for the establishment of liberty and justice. May the American people heed the warning lights and steer from the breakers.—Samuel P. Putnam.

WITHOUT the support afforded them by the delusive consolations of religion—a system of allegiance to a god—the worst of the evils which afflict humanity could not exist for a year. Deprived of the hope of compensation for evil, in a god-arranged hereafter, men would insist that this life be made worth having by the arrest of abuses. Thought, freed from the nightmare of superstition, would waste no more time trying to find out "purpose" where there is no purposer. The possibilities of being would become the starting-point; the goal, that man himself might control the earthquake and the storm, the beginnings and the ends of life. Such a new departure taken, men would soon look back upon present views of evil as a something to be transmuted into good, by the alchemy of a god, much as we now do upon the supineness of an age which deemed it blasphemous to do anything to stop pestilence other than to make a sign of the cross, in red chalk, upon the street door.—John Francis Smith.

TYRANNY is a monster that never dies. It has passed into a proverb that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; and that is because the spirit of oppression is never destroyed, and, on its part, is sleeplessly vigilant. Behold here to-day [1878] this great people, whose passion for liberty is recorded in splendid pages of history, whose resolution to build on these islands a commonwealth of justice and freedom is written on every acre of its soil in their heart's blood, and in royal blood too; and yet after all these sacrifices and heroic martyrdoms, the scratch of one man's pen can run through the achievements of centuries and turn the arm of England to a bulwark of barbarism. The cause of such recurrences is not far to seek. The fatality is not in the evil thing, but in some strange popular hallucination like that which Hercules had about the ninth hydra head. Instead of killing that, he hid it under a stone; and, in the same way, whenever in history, the Anglo-Saxon has vanquished a wrong, he has always spared one of its heads. He hides it away; he calls it obsolete; but, after lying still for a long time, up it starts again at the call of some ambitious partisan, all through this curious disinclination to eradicate a wrong utterly and leave no germ of it behind. The chief art of reform is to be radical. No unrepented statute is ever obsolete. The head of every wrong lives still while its principle is spared, and though it seems antiquated one day, it may be a "spirited policy" the next.—Moncure D. Conway.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STECK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANI, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

SAYS

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Travels in Faith.

"THE Rev. Mr. Oldbuck is a sort of reminiscent sinner." "How so?" "He revels in the recollection of what a devil of a fellow he was in his youth."—Life.

JOE JONES, a brother of "Sam" Jones, has started out as a revivalist. But, as he is not very vulgar, there are some who believe that he will not be a success.—New York Tribune.

WIFE (reading paper): "Just see the frightful effects of rum, John; here's a young man got drunk and walked right into a church." Husband (drowsily): "Yes, yes; rum's liable to land a man most anywhere!"—Puck.

In a prominent position on the wall of a house of refreshment in north London is displayed the following: "Happy is the people whose God is the Lord." The effect is somewhat spoiled by the proximity of this warning in large type: "Patrons are requested to keep a sharp eye on their overcoats and umbrellas."

A LITTLE boy was reading from an old-fashioned primer, the letter "s" of which was made long, very much like the letter "f" of the present time. He came to the sentence about Solomon, which he read as follows: "Solomon was the wisest man that ever lived." "True, my boy, true," said his father, who was listening. "He had a thousand of 'em."—Boston Transcript.

"Beg pardon, sir," said the passenger in the skull cap, tired of the monotony of the journey and desirous of scraping an acquaintance with the man in the next seat, "are you traveling for some house?" "No, sir," replied the other. "I am not in business. I am a Universalist preacher." "Shake!" rejoined the man in the skull cap, heartily. "I'm an agent for a fire extinguisher myself."—Tribune.

"In our company during the civil war," said Captain T. E. Barlow, of Milwaukee, "was a stuttering sergeant named Thomas and a chaplain named Chenault, who was exceedingly untidy in personal appearance. The sergeant was a wit and gave the chaplain no end of trouble. One cold day the parson had preached for over an hour, and at the close of his discourse asked any one who felt serious to come forward. The sergeant went at once. 'Do you really feel serious?' asked the chaplain, rather doubtful of his convert. 'Se-serious! I sh-sh-should say I—I di-did. Any m-man w-would feel s-se-serious to s-s sit on a c-ca-ake of ice t-t-two hours and h-he-hear y-you p-preach,' was the reply. On another occasion at mess the sergeant began to eat before the chaplain had asked the accustomed blessing. Extending his hands over the table, the chaplain said, 'Pause, sergeant, pause.' 'Y-yes, I s-s see 'em. D-d-d-d—d dirty ones, too.'"

God's constabulary—the holy gentlemen who depute themselves to assist the Omnipotent in enforcing their version of his law—have achieved a signal triumph in two American states, and doubtless suffer an appropriate elation. In Massachusetts they have procured the passage of a Sunday law so stringent that in order to kiss his neighbor's wife on "the Lord's day" a man must cross the line into Connecticut; and in Tennessee they have imprisoned some Seventh Day Adventists who, after keeping the Sabbath appointed by God, did not keep that, also, appointed by man. I dare say it is all right; I am no theologian, but with a view to founding my faith upon the rock of reason I am emboldened to ask that some member of the Sacred Constabulary explain for my readers the Christian's true justification in substituting the first day of the week for the seventh, as a day to be kept holy. I have known the explanation to be made in many pages, and even in several volumes, but I want it done in ten lines. And if it be well done I promise to print it here absolutely without comment. All that is needed is a citation of the divine authority under which the change was made—not the authority of any council of any church, just a law of God plainly and unequivocally repealing the former law. Surely a change fraught with so disagreeable consequences to the Adventist gentlemen of Tennessee must have divine sanction—where is it to be found? Far be it from me to incite, or by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedial measures. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

even permit, a religious controversy in these columns; my object is instruction. If the information sought do not appear it cannot be given. The request is made in good faith, and compliance will be met with gratitude and courtesy. The matter may be considered as of the nature of a competition: Who, in the space allowed, can say the best thing in justification of the change of the Sabbath from the seventh day to the first? Probably a half million persons will read it—what an opportunity to do good!—Ambrose Pierce, in San Francisco Examiner.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes' walk. The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1.00 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine].

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator].

News of the Week.

SECRETARY OF STATE GRESHAM is seriously ill.

"COIN'S FINANCIAL SCHOOL" has been selling for several months at the rate of about 15,000 copies per day.

JOHN BROWN, JR., son of Brown of Ossawatimie, died at his home on the Island of Put-in-Bay on May 2. He was 74 years of age.

THE schooner George R. White was wrecked on the Alaska coast and seventeen of the crew were drowned or frozen to death. Eight escaped.

THE reargument on the Income Tax cases in the Supreme Court began in Washington last Monday, May 6, Justice Jackson having become able to sit.

THE French religious orders are said to be preparing to resist the new tax levied on their property. A conflict between the church and government is probable.

IT has been snowing heavily at Rico, Col. There was a fall of six inches on the night of May 2, and snow continued to fall without intermission all the next day.

A CABINET crisis seems imminent in Hungary, the trouble growing out of the opposition of the Vatican to the ecclesiastical reform bills which have so long agitated Hungary.

THE president and secretary of the Omnibus Employees' Union of Paris have been sent to prison for six months each on the charge of having incited the strikers to violence.

THE New York legislature has passed a bill providing for the study of the effects of alcoholic drinks and other narcotics, in connection with physiology and hygiene in the public schools.

IT is reported that there are indications of a serious fight between Utah Democrats and the Mormon church, the former accusing the latter of direct and active affiliation with the Republicans.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE has just received from President Seth Low a guarantee of $1,000,000 for the new library building of the college, and $300,000 from Trustee William O. Schermerhorn for the Natural Science building.

LEATHER is rapidly rising in price, it is asserted under the manipulation of the Leather Trust, and shoes give promise of increasing in expensiveness in about the same ratio that beef and oil have under similar influences, coupled with scarcity.

IT is reported that Japan will yield to the protest of Russia, France, and Germany, and relinquish her hold on the Chinese mainland, including even the much-coveted Port Arthur. It is a matter of serious doubt whether the Japanese people will submit to the demands of the European powers. A revolt is not unlikely to occur, and it is assured that the present ministry will have to go.

It will hereafter be a misdemeanor in New York for bakers and other workers in flour and meal products to labor more than ten hours a day. Four deputy factory inspectors with a salary of $1,200 a year each and traveling expenses are to enforce the law.

AT last the "reform" Police Board of New York city is completed. The president is Theodore Roosevelt, Republican, of civil service reform fame; Avery D. Andrews, Democrat, treasurer; Frederick Dent Grant, Republican, and Andrew D. Parker, O'Brien Democrat.

THE silver issue seems likely, judging from the present outlook, to rive the Democratic party in twain. The Republicans are holding together a little better so far, but there can be no doubt that when the national convention meets the storm will break, if not before.

ON April 28 Henry Lauschall and his fifteen-year-old son, who live at the Hotel Lavette, New York, were arrested at Woodcliff, N. J., and fined $20 each for fishing on Sunday. Landlord Louis Lavette, of this city, paid the fines (presumably under protest) and says he will carry the case to the higher courts.

THE news from Cuba is generally to the effect that the insurgents won some victories over the Spanish troops during the two weeks ending last Saturday, but later dispatches may put a new aspect on affairs. The insurgents have nearly as many presidents as there are New York newspapers receiving dispatches from the Island.

A FEARFUL cyclone swept through northwestern Iowa on the evening of May 3. About thirty people were killed and more than one hundred injured, many fatally, in the vicinity of Sioux Center, Sibley, Laurens, Sutherland, and adjoining towns. Great damage was done to property, and Sioux Center calls for assistance, a very large number of families being homeless.

THE bigots and grandmotherites have won another victory. The New York legislature adopted the bill for the closing of the barber shops in all parts of the state on Sunday, except in this city and Saratoga Springs, where they may remain open until 1 P.M. Mayor Strong, of New York, has approved the measure, which now lacks only the signature of Governor Morton to become law. And this is the close of the nineteenth century!

AT a banquet of ministers in Chicago on the evening of May 1, Fred L. Chapman, editor of a church paper, said he had thoroughly investigated the cost of conversions in that city, and he found that each soul saved by the Baptists cost $285; by the Methodists, $384; the Presbyterians, $533, and the Congregationalists, $580, the average being, $443. Under the law of competition it would appear that the Baptists will ultimately possess the earth.

ABOUT a year ago, while Brooklyn was suffering from a small-pox scare, two men were locked up in a stable by Health Commissioner Emery's orders, because they would not submit to vaccination. On the following day they were brought up on habeas corpus proceedings and released by Justice Gaynor of the Supreme Court. The General Term of the Supreme Court reversed Justice Gaynor's decision, but he has now been sustained by the Court of Appeals. Dr. Emery contended that he could enforce compulsory vaccination.

THE trouble between England and Nicaragua seems to be settled for the present, Nicaragua agreeing to pay the indemnity—which is guaranteed by Salvador—in London, and the British forces have been withdrawn from Corinto. But while the Nicaraguan government is glad to get the matter arranged the people of the country are apparently very much dissatisfied over the outcome and may arise against the Zelaya government. Fighting is reported to have already begun in Granada and Leon. There may also be a union of the Central American states against England.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.	$1.00
Fifty copies.	4.50
One hundred copies.	8.00

Gulling the Cadets.

Some time since the students at the United States Military Academy at West Point were publicly presented with Bibles. The presentation address was made by Rev. Dr. R. S. McArthur, of the Calvary Baptist church of this city. Here are a few choice sentences from the speech:

"The Bible has controlled the legislation of the world. The Bible is the noblest teacher of morals. Give it the first place in your studies. The Bible will stand when all other books are forgotten. Moses will live when his critics are dead. With loyalty to the American flag blend loyalty to God, to truth, and to the banner of Immanuel. Be soldiers of Jesus Christ as you are soldiers of the American republic, and you will at last come off more than conquerors over every foe."

The Bible has had considerable influence on the legislation of the Christian world, but that influence has been almost wholly disastrous. It has caused and intensified oppression and cruelty, and has shed the blood of hundreds of millions of human beings. One Bible text—"Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live"—coupled with Jesus' recognition of demoniacal possession, alone caused the terrible death of millions. The Bible inculcates some good morals, but most of the precepts that can properly be so classed are the common property of the race, and upon them the Bible writers had no patent. Very many of its so-called moral teachings are the very reverse of moral, while the special teachings attributed to Jesus are so impractical, so unadapted to the conditions of existence as we find them on earth, that a true Christian, a Christian in the sense that he puts in practice all the alleged ethical commands of Jesus, cannot be found in a civilized land to-day, and if, by a possibility amounting almost to a miracle, one should be found, Dr. McArthur and the rest of the nominal Christians would promptly send him to an asylum as an incurable lunatic. This is not exaggeration—it is the language of sober fact. The men of the past who gave the Bible the "first place" in their studies were almost without exception fanatics and contempters of all knowledge acquired by painstaking research, and they were also generally persecutors for opinion's sake, and often themselves fell victims to fanatics of other schools. Dr. McArthur's next two assertions are matters of opinion with which we need not here concern ourselves. Loyalty to "God" and to "the banner of Immanuel" are compatible with loyalty to free institutions only when the devotee fails in several important particulars to be a consistent Bible Christian. As to the possibility of being "soldiers of the American republic" and at the same time "soldiers of Jesus Christ," even Dr. McArthur should blush at the mere suggestion. It is simply impossible for a man to be a soldier and obey the commands of Jesus as enunciated in the Sermon on the Mount. When the embryo warriors at West Point conclude to make the Bible their "first study," they will find this out, and the discovery may shipwreck their faith.

Leaning on Thrice-Broken Reeds.

The pretended Buddhist "Life of Jesus," "found" in a monastery in Thibet by a Russian calling himself Natovitch, has caused considerable controversy. In an article written for the Nineteenth Century by Prof. Max Muller that eminent scholar refutes the claims made for the authenticity of the alleged biography, but takes occasion to express his rationalistic opinions concerning Jesus. This presentation of unorthodox views excited the wrath of a French Christian, Pierre Courbet, who attacks Professor Muller in Cosmos, and in the course of his argument gives what the Literary Digest flatteringly calls "an interesting and valuable popular résumé of the historical evidence for the accepted view of Christ's life." The American paper quotes at length from the article, and we shall here comment on a few of the wonderful assertions made by the Christian defender. He attempts to prove the existence of Jesus and to establish the fact that he worked many and marvelous miracles. Strangely enough, however, he introduces no new witnesses and those upon whom he relies have been discredited, some of them argued out of court by distinguished Christian advocates themselves. But M. Courbet seems to be perfectly innocent of all knowledge of this fact.

Before passing to the main division of our subject it may not be amiss to quote a few sentences from another part of M. Courbet's paper. He is speaking of the evidence for the probable truth of the "Buddhist Life":

"In the present case, it would be necessary to begin by proving that the Buddhist Life of Jesus really dates from the time of Jesus and that its authors were really persons who knew him. How shall we show this when we do not know who these people were, and when no other author has alluded, up to the present time, to a work of this kind?"

Can M. Courbet prove that the Life of Jesus contained in the Four Gospels really dates from the time of Jesus, and that its writers were really persons who knew him? If he can, the Christian church will undoubtedly confer upon him greater honors than any man before him has received. For centuries it has been longing and hunting for conclusive evidence of that kind, and for ages skeptics have continued to ask how it could be known that the gospels dated from Jesus's time and were written by men who knew him, when we did not know who those writers were and when no contemporaries of Jesus alluded to the exploits credited to him.

"Again, it would be necessary to establish that the manuscript from which the translation was made was really the original, or that it had not been altered in the process of copying."

Can these facts be established as regards the manuscripts from which the Gospels were translated? Who wrote the books which bear the names of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and who knows that the manuscripts from which the present versions were translated were the originals, and that there have been no serious alterations in the process of copying?

"That [the existence of Jesus] was passed in the full daylight of the Greco-Roman civilization, the most brilliant that the world ever saw before our own times. Jesus had for witnesses of his public life not only his compatriots, then intimately mingling in the movement of Hellenic civilization, and afterward scattered over the whole world, but the Greeks, with their highly developed intellectual culture; the Romans, then at the height of their political power."

That reads well, and no doubt it will profoundly impress the uncultured Christian masses, to whom it will be quoted and requoted in the religious papers, the newspapers, the magazines, the Sunday-school sheets, and even in books. An industriously and extensively circulated misstatement will temporarily serve the same purpose as the truth, and the common people are too busily engaged in the struggle for existence to spend time in looking behind the glittering assertions of M. Courbet to see if there are any facts to support his sweeping statements. Later on we shall examine some of his documentary witnesses, of whom he informs us there is almost a plethora. That they are not trustworthy, and satisfactory to men who have made a critical study of the subject, even to men who are sympathetically inclined toward religion and particularly Christianity, is shown by a passage which M. Courbet quotes from Max Muller. Speaking of the need for a more accurate history of the Nazarene, Professor Muller remarks: "It would be a history written outside of the legendary halo, not by his disciples, but by an independent ocular witness, who had seen and heard the Christ during the three years of his active life, who had been present at the passion, and at the events that followed it." This is undoubtedly the "one thing" lacking in the armory of the church, and it is not impossible that Professor Muller's words may give the apologists a hint where to deposit it, for he suggests that in this period of unexpected discoveries it would not be impossible that such a history should be found in Egypt or elsewhere.

Upon this M. Courbet comments to the effect that there could have been in Judea no independent (impartial) hearer of Jesus's teachings and witness of the miracles he is alleged to have performed; all must have been prejudiced for or against him. Is it reasonable to expect, he asks, "that high priests, the princes of Israel," would sit down to write, "by their scribes, the life of him whom they had put to death?" "If then an independent author had undertaken to write the life of Jesus, we may be sure that the synagog would have seen to it that his work did not survive. There could remain only the lives of Jesus written by his disciples." We will not dispute that M. Courbet has very faithfully pictured the character of the priest, who, it will as cheerfully be conceded, is essentially the same in all ages and all countries. He is dead set against the presentation of both sides of a question, and can be trusted to do all that within him lies to cause the memory of his opponents "to disappear as soon as possible." But if we have no record of the events that are claimed to have occurred in Judea at that time save those which come from his own disciples, what guarantee have we that the story is faithfully told? Is it not self-evident that it is one-sided, exaggerated, replete with false interpretations of natural phenomena, marred by hyperbole, loaded down with the accretions with which tradition burdens history in all ages when it is passed from lip to lip of peasants and local story tellers instead of being recorded on the written page?

It is not necessary here to enter in detail into an examination of the question whether Jesus was an historical character; he may have been, but the evidence for the assumption is very far from being conclusiv. Jesus was a common name among the Jews, and it would not be at all strange if a man bearing that cognomen was executed as a criminal, or if he had made attacks on the orthodox religion of his time and claimed to be a worker of miracles. Belief in demoniacal possession was almost universal, and miracles were the best cards of those who sought for leadership among their fellows. The apologists for Christianity have something more to do than establish on a sure foundation the claim that a man named Jesus attracted attention in Judea at the beginning of what is now called the first century and was executed for heresy or sedition, although they have not yet done that much, and there does not seem to be any prospect of their ever being able to accomplish that result. But even if they could do that they would be scarcely better off than they are at present. To prove that a man lived at a certain time is one thing; to prove that he was the son of a ghost and a virgin, that he raised the dead and performed other miracles, and that after he died he lay in the grave three days and then came to life and ascended into heaven—wherever that may be—are quite other things, and require evidence that no church has ever been able to produce in support of the stories it tells of its man-God or God-man. Christianity has not a shred of credible testimony to offer in verification of the Christ myth. What it can say for the truth of the story of the man Jesus may be indicated by a few quotations from M. Courbet. Referring to Max Muller's desire for a new history of Jesus, he says:

"Certainly we do not do Max Muller the injustice to believe that he really has doubts of the existence of Jesus. If he had, we should simply refer him to Tacitus, whose standing as a historian I suppose no one will contest, and to his famous passage relative to Jesus."

Is M. Courbet merely innocent, or is he attempting to impose on the innocence or the supposed innocence of his readers? Probably no one, unless possibly Prof. Edwin Johnson, would question the standing of Tacitus as a historian, but that is not the point at all. The question is, was Tacitus the author of the "Annals," and if he wrote the "Annals" did he write that particular passage in the XV. book upon which Christians build such a towering superstructure of assumptions? The most trustworthy of historians may be the victim of the forger, and there are very strong reasons for believing that the authority of Tacitus was invoked by a Christian forger of the fifteenth century to buttress the historical weakness of the church. It is strange indeed that not until 1429 did a Christian apologist discover that Tacitus had written that Jesus was crucified under Pontius Pilate, eager as they were for testimony of such a nature. This is all the more wonderful when we take into consideration the esteem in which he was held by his own and the succeeding century. He had already acquired great reputation as an orator when Pliny entered public life, and the two became warm friends; eleven of Pliny's letters are addressed to him. In addition to this, says Johnson's Cyclopaedia, "the Emperor Tacitus claimed relationship to him, and ordered his works to be placed in all public libraries, and ten copies to be made every year at the public expense and placed in the Archæia." This is very significant. Tacitus, the historian, flourished during the latter part of the first and the early years of the second centuries, while Tacitus, the emperor, was born about 200 and died in 275-6. How does it happen, then, that not one of the Christian fathers and polemics of the second, third, or fourth century stumbled upon this vastly important proof that Jesus had lived and been crucified at the time they asserted? Is it not indeed suspicious that it was not until fourteen centuries of Christian practice of retail and wholesale forgery of documents had passed that it was found that Tacitus, the careful Roman historian, had heard of and recorded the death of the man Jesus?

It is admitted by impartial writers that most of the works of Tacitus "have come down to us only in a mutilated and corrupted form." The passage in question was not quoted by any Christian Father; Tertullian quotes the "History" (not the "Annals") and refers to other Roman history to prove that the Christians were persecuted under Nero, but makes no mention of this passage, which was just what he needed; in no other parts of his writings has Tacitus made even the most remote allusion to Christ or Christians. To these reasons for rejecting as spurious or a corruption the passage in Book XV. of the "Annals" of Tacitus could be added at least a score more if we had the space to spare for the purpose. But it is scarcely necessary to dwell longer on this one alleged proof, when we reflect that even if the passage were indeed written by Tacitus it would not be the testimony of a contemporary of Jesus. There is yet nothing but hearsay; no eye- or ear-witness has testified.

This is an average sample of the evidence that M. Courbet presents to Max Muller and the world to prove that Jesus actually lived and was crucified. If he does so poorly at this comparatively easy task, how will he succeed when it comes to trying to establish the reality of Christ's miracles and the verity of the alleged resurrection? That remains to be seen.

A Mental Reservation.

"When Catholics are in power they always respect the rights of conscience possessed by the minority. For instance, when they had control of Manitoba, they granted to the Protestants the kind of schools desired by the latter. So, to-day, in the province of Quebec, where they are in a majority, they are liberal and considerate. There is no school question there. They do not insist upon a nominally unsectarian system of education that in practice will be made essentially Catholic. They ask nothing for themselves that they do not yield to their neighbors. They are the real lovers of religious liberty."—Catholic Review.

It can be conceded that some modern Catholics when not in power wish to "respect the rights of conscience possessed by the minority," and think that if they were in undisputed possession of temporal authority they would be perfectly tolerant, but the test would come when the church ordered them to persecute. Would they dare disobey? It is simply amazing that such a journal as the Catholic Review, one of the ablest edited and apparently most fair of its class, can have the hardihood to assert that Catholics when in power always respect the rights of conscience of the minority. Certainly no fair-minded person will accuse us of discourtesy when we say that the intelligent editor of the Catholic Review knows that his statement, as made, is the reverse of true, but we suspect that there was a Jesuit reservation in his avowal. He says that the Catholic church always respects the rights of conscience possessed by the minority. But does he believe that the minority possess the right of conscience to reject the teachings of the church? Undoubtedly he does not, and so he does not think he has borne false witness in asserting that the Catholic church always respects the rights of conscience "possessed" by the minority. As the minority do not possess the right to reject the teachings of the church, the church does not fail to respect the real rights of conscience possessed by them when it punishes them for heresy. Commenting on the same paragraph the American Sentinel well says:

"It is true that to-day the attitude of the Catholics in the province of Quebec is more in accordance with the principles of religious liberty than is the attitude of so-called Protestants in Manitoba. But Rome must be judged not by what she does in such a country as Canada, where she is constantly on the defensive, but by her record in Spain, in the Caroline islands, in Italy and the various South American countries where her priests are the ruling power. It is too late in the history of the world for Rome to successfully pose as the champion of liberty."

No church is dangerous when it does not possess civil power, and no church can be trusted when invested with that power. No other conclusion is possible to the careful student of history. Every sect is the devoted friend of liberty for itself and when it is in the hopeless minority, but a new vision comes when the reins of authority fall into its hands. Our Seventh Day Adventist friends are now doing splendid work for liberty, and their services to the secular cause are invaluable, but we sometimes wonder what they would do to the contemner of the Saturday Sabbath if they possessed the numbers and wealth, and the consequent political power, of the Sunday worshippers. We do not forget that the Covenanters—who, under the name of Reformed Presbyterians, are the leaders in this country in the struggle to establish an absolute spiritual despotism—fought superbly and devotedly in Scotland for their own freedom. We cannot rid ourselves of the conviction that the belief that one has a divinely revealed system of truth and morals which he is commissioned by God to defend and extend puts him under a constant temptation to use Catholic and Covenanter weapons when preaching and moral suasion fail.

Russia is taking steps to enforce Sunday observance more strictly than heretofore; in Chicago the Sunday Observance League will this year make another attempt to prevent Sunday baseball; Charlton, the Canadian champion of Sunday sacredness enforced by law, has introduced a new bill in Parliament to "promote the observance of the Lord's day." Nothing in that about securing a day of "rest" for the workingman, is there? Perhaps it is thought that in Canada there is no need of being so hypocritical concerning the matter of Sabbath observance as some of the Sundayites think is necessary in the United States.

We have received from Mr. Putnam a brief note announcing his arrival in England and his cordial welcome from Messrs. Watts and Foote, and also that he had mailed us some "News and Notes"—which, however, have failed to get here in season for this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The weather during his passage was delightful, he says, and he had no touch of seasickness, but kept in the jolliest trim possible all the time. The only one on board seriously afflicted was a Catholic priest, and his indisposition was evidently a case of whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. Mr. Putnam's delayed communication will undoubtedly arrive in time for our next issue.

Every few days a company of boys from a Catholic institution just below THE TRUTH SEEKER office come marching up Lafayette Place in military formation, preceded by a band and armed with wooden guns. They are being drilled by the adult followers of the "Prince of Peace" for the work of slaughter. But those wooden guns are only a feeble imitation of war's deadly weapons. These Catholic boys ought to have the opportunity to practice with the "real thing," as do the boys of the Presbyterian Sunday-school of West Duluth, Minn. The boy's brigade is drilling in the manual of arms. "A genuine Gatling gun was obtained, and the young soldiers can handle it to perfection. The gun weighs 1,800 pounds, and it is managed by six boys," says the Superior Leader. So satisfied are these good Christian boys with their death-dealing Gatling that a new company will be organized in the near future. Our Catholic friends will have to hustle if they get ahead of the Presbyterians. God bless the olive branches of Christ! The temple of Janus is wide open now.

"God waits his time. God is never in a hurry. God has given them time to repent, and still they fight God. Their [the Chinese's] potter's vessel will be broken by the Japanese."—Rev. M. L. Taft.

It would appear that God was in so much of a hurry that he made 400,000,000 of people so imperfect that he had to make another nation of 40,000,000 to civilize them through wholesale slaughter. What sickening cant is this talk about God giving the Chinese time to repent? Of what are they to repent? Of the sins they have committed because the god who made them gave them such natures that they could not do otherwise? No doubt Chinese civilization is, in many respects, very undesirable (although the chief offense of that people in the eyes of Mr. Taft is its rejection of his religion), but who is responsible for that undesirable civilization if not the "perfect" god worshiped by the missionary, and who, he stoutly asserts, made the world and all that it contains? Mr. Taft does not agree with those who, he says, declare that Japan will give up Christianity and civilization. But who knew that Japan had accepted Christianity? Why, says the preacher, "in the Japanese navy they have chaplains and Bible classes." Have they? Well, that must settle the question, for we have chaplains in our navy, and the Bible classes in our Sunday-schools are also uniformed and armed. But on the other hand, in the Japanese schools they teach evolutionary science and will have nothing to do with religion. Will not the school rather than the navy form the character of the rising generation?

Rev. Mr. Talmage told his congregation the other Sunday that there were men in the house who would give a thousand worlds, if they had them, to get back to the placid faith of their fathers and mothers. The devotees of any other superstition could as easily say the same thing concerning those who have grown out of that superstition. The clergyman said that "we" may help these longing ones, "never through their heads but always through their hearts." It has long been observed that the Christian evangelist appeals to the fears and other emotions of his hearers rather than to their thinking faculties. Mr. Talmage has made no discovery. He further remarks that "these skeptics, when brought to Jesus, will be mightily effective." Yes, when. They will be far more effective, he continues, "than those who have never examined the evidences of Christianity." This is in sly praise of himself, for in another place he tells us that he understands all the processes by which men "get into the dark," for he has traveled "with burning feet that blistered way." (That sounds somewhat peculiar—perhaps he meant to say that he had traveled with blistered feet that burning way.) But as he confesses that he does not yet understand the "mysteries" of the faith he preaches, it is hard to see how that kind of an examination of the evidences of Christianity makes the repentant skeptic such an efficient missionary of that which he formerly rejected. But it is little use to try to find a reason for the assertions of Mr. Talmage, and it is certain that there is rarely reason in them.

As will be seen by reference to our news column, the Meadow Brook Hunt Club at Hempstead, L. I., and some of the influential residents of the vicinity, are very much excited over the arrest of two members of the club for Sunday golf playing. It is demanded that Deputy Sheriff Smith be removed from his office because he made these arrests. This wrath seems to us to be ill timed and misapplied. Why should the officer be removed for trying to enforce the law which the hunt club and the "influential citizens" of Hempstead have not made the slightest effort to have repealed? We received no assistance from the club nor from said "influential citizens" when we sent out our recent petition to the legislature for the repeal of the Sunday law of the state. It was under this law that these players were arrested. Neither have we heard that they sent a word of protest to the legislature when the tyrannical Barbers' bill, just made law, was pending. Did they think that they were so "influential," so fashionable, that they could drive roughshod through statutes that would catch and hold the poor and uninfluential? Some people never think of liberty until their own is menaced, and we sincerely hope that the work of arrest and fining will go on until all these "influential" violators of a law they have not the manliness and foresight to sweep from the statute books are convinced that a wrong done to the humblest citizen is a wrong done to themselves, and that a bad law is always at the service of the first bigot or revengeful person who cares to use it. Down with the Sunday laws.

The importance of having agencies ready and funds on hand to do missionary work is again shown by a call from far-off Manitoba. The legislature of that province has just met, and one of the burning issues it will have to consider is the Bible in the schools, the result of the long fight between the Catholics and the Protestants there. One of our oldest subscribers and a member of the Manitoba government writes us that the members of the legislature ought to have copies of Dr. Westbrook's pamphlet, the "Bible in the Public Schools," and other literature on the question, in order that they may more intelligently discuss the subject, but he was unable to do more than contribute two dollars toward the expense. Thinking that such an opportunity to impress correct principles upon a body of legislators should not be lost, we asked Dr. Westbrook to furnish the pamphlets and we would do the rest. He cheerfully made the donation, and we have mailed a copy to each member of the government, executive as well as legislative. We are always willing to do this kind of work, and would gladly provide the literature too if we had the means. To Dr. Westbrook's reasonable little work we added Mr. Chapman's "Bible Impeached," and we hope the legislators will read both carefully. THE TRUTH SEEKER has not a very large circulation in Manitoba, naturally, but we hope that all its readers there, few or many, will write to their members of the legislature and urge upon them the fact that the only way to settle the long and hotly-waged school fight rightly is to take the Bible entirely from the public schools and conduct these institutions in a secular manner. And we also trust that every one of our readers who is interested in the incessant warfare necessary to be waged against theological tyranny will see to it that we have funds with which to distribute literature on demand as occasion requires. We cannot always find a wealthy author or publisher to help us out.

"Some crass astronomer is reported to have said, 'I have swept the heavens with my telescope and have found no God.' The verdict of the modern astronomer is, 'I have swept the heavens with my telescope and I have found no devil.' In all the fields of space there is law—rhythmic, benignant, divine law."—The New Unity.

To compare (apparently) small things with greater—in a walk one day a commotion was heard in a clump of bushes by the roadside. Upon investigation it was discovered that a snake had crawled to and coiled itself about the nest of a pair of birds. In the nest were four young birds, and the eyes of the reptile gleamed viciously as its forked tongue darted in and out of its open mouth. The father and mother birds were frantic with fear for their imperiled offspring and anger against the snake. They ruffled their feathers, they uttered cries of pain and anger, they dashed madly at the head of their enemy, they pretended to be wounded and fluttered on the ground in the hope of drawing the snake away in pursuit of themselves. Who could measure adequately the agony of those feathered parents? The reptile fled when we made a motion to strike it, and the nestlings were saved—for the moment. But the saving providence was human, and not in one instance out of ten thousand does it appear at the right moment. In this little world of ours there have been uncounted millions of completed tragedies, of the nature of this one so barely averted. Whether they occurred in accordance with "rhythmic, benignant, divine law," or were caused by an infinite devil, would depend upon the point of view of the answerer of the question—perhaps. It would make some difference whether the query were answered by the victims, or by an optimistic Unitarian editor, comfortably clothed and well fed, sitting at ease in sheltered safety in his cosy sanctum.

A call is out for a national conference for "political reform," to be held at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, N. Y., June 28 to July 4. The subjects to be discussed are the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, for beverage purposes and their manufacture for medical and other uses by the state and federal governments; the tariff regulated by a national bureau; government ownership of all transit facilities; woman suffrage; the silver and currency questions, and the like. The Committee of Arrangements is a queer conglomeration. Of the noted friends of liberty on it we have space to mention but a few, to wit, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, erstwhile of that freedom-loving association, the American Sabbath Union, and now secretary of the Bureau of National Reform (God-in-the-Constitution), Washington, D. C.; B. O. Flower, editor of the Arena; Frances E. Willard (in the repertory of whose choice reforms is included the national publication of all newspapers and the supervision of our amusements by a Cabinet Bureau of the federal government), president of the national Women's Christian Temperance Union; Thaddeus B. Wakeman; Mary T. Burt, president of the New York State Women's Christian Temperance Union, and head of the Comstock division of the same organization and ex officio sponsor for the Mullin bill lately introduced in the legislature of this state and criticised in these columns; Rev. I. K. Funk, editor of the Voice; Mary E. Lease, and Bolton Hall. Among the other signers of the Call are Annie L. Diggs, a Liberal worker in Kansas; Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D., Universalist and affiliated with the God-in-the-Constitution folks; the presidents of eighteen Women's Christian Temperance Unions, and several other officers of that organization; Joseph Cook, of Boston, also a National Reformer, and a hundred or more equally pious people.

Here is an apparently new form of the resurrection argument, differing somewhat from the familiar chrysalis-butterfly illustration—which always fails to illustrate. Rev. I. N. Haldeman, of a Baptist church of this city, recently preached a sermon on that threadbare subject, "The Resurrection of Christ." The New York Times presents this summary of his paper:

"He explained that the resurrection might be comprehended by studying the processes of nature in the material world around us. Just as the seed planted in the earth first undergoes a process of decomposition by which the organic part falls off and gives birth to a germ, which, being nourished by sunshine, rain, and dew, comes forth re-embodied and produces the exact type of the original, so also the body, after mingling with the dust of the earth, gave birth to a germ which in the appointed time would raise up the body."

The seed does not "undergo a process of decomposition," and the germ is not born because the "organic part falls off." The germ is a part of the seed, and under the stimulus of warmth and moisture the previously dormant germ springs into active life and feeds during its earlier period of development upon the assimilable matter stored up in the rest of the seed. In the egg-producing families of the animal kingdom the germ feeds during its first stage of growth upon the food products stored within the shell. In placental mammals the germ is fed directly by the female parent. All these are different manifestations of the same natural process—the reproduction of individuals essentially alike. There is a regular sequence of causes and effects which perpetually exchange relative positions in the march of life. In all the higher forms of life—vegetable and animal—the parent does not die when the child is born—except, of course, in exceptional instances which in no sense invalidate the rule—and in no case do these processes of growth within the pale of tribal life furnish the analogy which Mr. Haldeman so longingly seeks. It is not the dead tree that sprouts in the ground and produces another tree of the same family as itself. It is dead and dead for good. But in its life it produced seeds, and it is these which develop under favorable conditions and perpetuate the race of their parent. It is not from the pigeon dying of disease or killed and eaten by man that the young pigeons spring after its death, but from the eggs it produced during life, which eggs, developing under auspicious conditions, perpetuate the race of pigeons. So it is not the body of man lying in the ground that contains the initial force of new life, but the germs developed in his body when alive and viril that are that initial force. They, growing under favorable conditions, perpetuate the race. It is always the race that is perpetuated by the birth of the young, not the individual. The individual has his term of existence, marked at beginning and end by birth and death. The race has also its term of existence, marked at the beginning by differentiation from an antecedent type, and at the end by the cessation, from whatever cause, of reproduction of new individuals. All these forces and manifestations of life are of this earth. The cottonwood tree reproduces its kind for life here, and not less does man. In all the multiform transformations of life in this world Mr. Haldeman can find no analogy for his soul-seed or seed-soul that parts from the body at the death of the latter, or after it has decayed, on this earth, and, after the passage of centuries or eons, reinvests itself with that body and takes it to another world for an eternal existence of joy or agony. Mr. Haldeman should adapt his theology to nature; he cannot adapt nature to his theology.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them: we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

A Little More Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self Contradictions of the Bible," to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to anything good.

"An Important Intimation."

There are, we regret to say, between one thousand and two thousand of our friends who have allowed their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to expire without renewing. This is a considerably larger portion than is pleasant to us, who depend upon the more or less prompt payment of subscriptions for the wherewithal to meet our bills. Now, we are not going to get angry, or scold, or do anything disagreeable about this, but we must appeal to our friends' good nature and generous feelings to remedy this deplorable and unsatisfactory state of affairs. We need the money badly—so do our creditors. The paper man, and the printer, and the compositor, and the mailer, and the post-office collector, and the clerks, and the landlord, and the insurance man, and the gas man, and the devil are always with us, not to mention the rest, and they all want money and want it bad, and want it when it is due. And when we haven't got it for them life is a burden—they make it so intentionally, blast 'em.

So now, as aforesaid, we appeal to our friends all over this country—thousands of them—to send the amount of their arrearages and as much in advance as they have been behind, to sort of even things up and turn about in fair play, as it were. A year's subscription from each one whose time has expired will make us easy—very easy—but if we can't have that then let us have what you can spare, and we will "grin and bear it" until you get the balance. The amounts are small individually and easily raised, but to us they collectively mean a good deal—just the difference between being even with the world and being unpleasantly behind.

The disciples of a certain philosopher, one day missing their teacher from his accustomed place in the midst of them, sought him at his unpretentious lodgings, where they discovered that he was suffering from the lack of a Square Meal. Of course they hastened to provide him with all that the inner sinner could desire, but he nevertheless took occasion to jab them with a moral pointed by the event. "Know, then" (said he), "that in order that you may permanently enjoy the light of a lamp, it is necessary occasionally to replenish the Oil."

Delinquents who renew at once will be spared the moral which their remissness might tempt us to draw.

There is always a demand for inexpensive tracts for general distribution. We have endeavored to supply that demand, and the reader who looks on page 317, this issue, will find a long list of them.

Extracts from Noah's Log.

EXPLANATORY.

While exploring the rocky gullies and canyons in the foothills of Mt. Ararat last summer, I found a roughly symmetrical mass of pure copper. Oxidized and honeycombed as it was, I recognized the metal immediately, and repressing a strong inclination to hunt for the lead and stake out my claim, I took my find home with me. Surprised at its diminishing weight as the moisture dried out of the spongy mass, I endeavored to saw into it. The pure metal inside tore off every tooth of the saw, and now convinced, and delighted, that it was a hollow cylinder of hardened copper, I brought it to America and gave it to a machinist to open. He ruined two dozen finely-tempered saws in the job, which I cheerfully settled for, as the cylinder contained a papyrus roll of manuscript of certainly great antiquity. My efforts to decipher it were baffled, as it was written in neither ancient nor modern Egyptian, new nor old Pali, nor in Greek, Latin, Sanscrit, or any other language with which I am acquainted. So I called in the services of those two able, eminent, and renowned professors of biology, bibliology, ethnology, and sockdology, the Right Rev. Watson Heston and the Very Rev. George E. Macdonald, who at once pronounced it ancient Cush and proceeded to translate it; the latter remarking, with a levity which but indifferently became his calling, as I thought, that the exceeding toughness of the yarn no doubt accounted for the difficulty of sawing into it—in which view his collaborator, to my surprise, was inclined to coincide. However, I cheerfully give them credit for the translation, but am free to maintain that the elegance of diction, force of expression, and choiceness of synonyms are my own.

Besides, I found it.

THE LOG.

Mon., 7 days out. Raining yet, very hard—A few sinners still on deck; a bunch got washed off last night; kinder sorry for them—Ham will get a rope's-end if he don't look out; he skylarks too much with the animals; put all the dogs in the cat's cage last night, and the whole menagerie got excited at the row they made; couldn't hear ourselves think for two hours; every brute in the outfit sung his song—Roof leaks—Women say it's wash-day and have started in on three weeks' wash; just like women; how'll they dry clothes this weather?

Course E.B.S. Ham at the wheel, Shem on the lookout.

Tues., 8 days out. 4 bells. Women are growling because the sun don't shine so the wash can dry; told them such murmuring as they indulged in was flying straight in the face of Providence; told me to mind my own business; remarked that I was captain here and wouldn't take back talk from anyone; hove a bucket of water over me, durn them. 6 bells. Got my log line strung up along 'tween decks and the whole blamed wash triced up in everybody's way. If I want to heave the log at 8 bells, overboard goes the wash, and don't care who likes it; I'm boss here. 8 bells. Didn't heave the log—Guess we're making four knots; wind fresh; course E.S.E. Shem at the wheel, Japheth on the lookout.

Wed., 9 days out. Ironing day; blowing a gale of wind; women are making hard work of it and getting seasick—Hove to at 8 bells this morning; lays easy; kicked Ham away from the wheel and steered his trick; afraid I can't make a sailor of him; wish I'd saved a few sinners to work ship; could have drowned them afterwards.

Heading N. E. by N. Japheth at the wheel.

Thurs., 10 days out. Wish I knew who drinks my whisky—Made sail at daylight; difficult work, this handling sail below decks; can't see aloft, must feel when sheets are home; don't like these new-fangled rolling topsails that furl themselves; they're not shipshape, but we're too short handed for the old style—Wind going down; course due E. Shem at the wheel, Ham on the lookout.

Fri., 11 days out. Foggy; can't see two lengths; two of us on the lookout—Ham is under the scuttlebutt, drunk; whisky lower; slight connection here, maybe—Women are quarreling among themselves; they're a heap of trouble; never quiet till they're seasick; found out they get seasick in a head sea; will remember this—The lion got out last night and made a lunch off my wife's pet dog Beauty; chased him back to his cage with a handspike; sorry I had to hurt him; seven pugs left now; we started with a pair to each woman.

No wind and nobody at the wheel.

Sat., 12 days out. Wish it would clear up; sinners must be all dead by this time—Have had a hard day of it; that boy Ham let go the port anchor, and the whole range of chain, 45 fathom, went out the hawse-pipe and fetched up with a jerk that carried away the windlass bitts and nearly tore the bows of her; kicked him up on deck in the rain while we mended the windlass; hunted him up to help heave in chain and found he'd sneaked down, got at my jug, and was dead drunk alongside the same; don't see what the Lord wanted to save him for—Must be clear of soundings now, so will keep her hove to for a while under short sail with the wheel lashed down.

Sun., 13 days out. Held religious exercises at 4 bells; Ham attended, very devout and penitent, with a head as big as the jug—Women have tricked themselves out and are mincing around showing off; made me put on a white shirt; will get rid of it directly—Dead calm all day—Found the ark had a slight list to starboard; investigated and discovered about three tons of stones, dead cats, and garbage stuck fast to the pitch outside; these things are what the sinners threw at the ark after we came aboard—Have locked up my whisky.

Wed., 16 days out. Made a great mistake when we started; was puzzled how to feed the spiders, musketoos, bedbugs, and such; turned them loose to hustle for themselves, and that's what they've done ever since—hustle—Another pug disappeared last night; six left—Gave Ham a talking to about getting drunk; was sorry and I boxed his ears; told him if I ever saw him drunk again aboard my ship I'd log him; he don't seem to care, but that's what I'll do every time—Still hove to.

Sun., 20 days out. Ham broke into my locker last night and is roaring drunk again; can't find the jug; will log him every time now—No religious exercises to-day; women are complaining of my impiety, but a man can't feel resigned when he has just lost a four gallon jug of the best Egyptian corn whisky.

Mon., 21 days out. Ham's drunk.

Tues., 22 days out. Ditto's ditto.

Wed., 23 days out. Do. do.

Thur., 24 days out. Do. blind do.

Fri., 25 days out. Do. dead do.

Sat. 26 days out. Do. got snakes; got 'em bad; wish I could find that jug.

Sun., 27 days out. Two more pugs missing; must keep away from the lion's cage when the women are around, he seems too pleased to see me and they are getting suspicious; four of the ugly brutes left now—Found my jug; Ham stowed it in my own bunk; he's smarter than I thought—Had religious exercises; women wanted to mourn for their pugs; am willing they should mourn—Took a cast of the lead at noon; thirty fathoms, mud bottom; made sail and squared away due E.

Mon., 28 days out. My wife has confiscated the jug and means to keep it; we'll see about that; says it is the cause of poor, dear Ham's sickness; undoubtedly; should have let it alone—Shem at the wheel, Japheth on the lookout; course E.

Wed., 30 days out. MUTINY! BLOODY MUT—d—n!—* * * †—!! [NOTE—Here the manuscript bears evidence that Captain Noah was suddenly interrupted while writing.—Trs.]

Fri., 32 days out. Have had a lively time; discipline is restored, but the whisky jug is gone—smashed over my head—all on account of the pugs; had hoped to rid the world of those parodies on the canine race, and would have succeeded if my wife hadn't overhauled my pockets when I was asleep and read this log. Certain references to the pugs put her on the lookout and she and the other women watched me; one of the brutes littered last night; I couldn't resist the temptation, and so fed the whole batch, mother and all, to the lion; in a minute had four furious women afoot of me, biting and clawing; sung out for help and Shem and Japheth bore down and rescued me; Ham helped the women and made a majority for them; his mother had the jug, that's why; managed to floor him with a pump-brake, but they were still too many for us and chased us around decks till they got tired and sat down to cry; got to my room and began writing them down in the log when they started in again; my wife smashed the whisky jug over my head—then we all escaped on deck and went aloft; couldn't follow us, but sat down and said things—Had a council of war, then Shem shinned over to the foremast and cut away all the jib halliards and sheets and halliards on the fore—Ark had broached to in trough of sea when Japheth left the wheel to help me, and had laid there with yards square and rolling considerable; women could stand that motion, but not a head sea, so now when she came up to the wind and began pounding up and down and drifting astern, they got qualmish and in twenty minutes were sprawled out helpless; Ham didn't know enough to take the wheel and throw her off, so we came down, tied the women hand and foot, and then went for Ham; tried him up and rope-ended him till his nose bled; begged and howled, but had to take it and learn that mutiny is unsafe aboard my ship—Kept her head to the sea till we had spliced and rove off the gear, then set canvas and squared away again—Women got better; read the articles to them; were penitent and promised to behave, but before turning them loose we went on a pug hunt and passed two of them in to the lion; only one left now, but we haven't found it yet; women howled a good deal and called us heartless, cruel fiends—that's all right.

My wife had lost the log in her excitement, and I only found it to-day; course N.E. by E. Shem at the wheel, Jap. on the lookout.

Sun., 34 days out. No religious services to-day; women are talking about me—don't talk to me; if they do I'll speak of that jug; course due E, blowing fresh. J. at wheel, S. on lookout.

Mon., 35 days out. Wash day, but there is no washing going on; won't have it; am captain here; they were ugly at first, but I hauled her on a wind and said nothing—Can't find that pug—Keep Ham at work on the menagerie now, feeding the animals and cleaning the cages—Dead calm.

Wed., 37 days out. Nothing new; pug still missing; good mind to turn the lion loose; he'll find the cur.

Fri., 39 days out. If I don't find that pug to-day will let the lion out first thing to-morrow.

Sat., 40 days out. Stopped raining—We all went on deck this morning; it was a frightful picture—sun shining, not a cloud in the sky and not a sign of land nor a ship, or even a bird, in all this expanse of desolation; no life or joyousness, nothing but muddy water; the dead world fathoms underneath, and we alone, with our ark, all that was left, and whisky gone—not a shot in the locker.

At noon locked up the women and turned the lion loose; he didn't find the pug, but found most everything else; smashed some bird cages, and a raven and dove got away; dove came back at sundown, but the raven didn't; let all the birds out to get the air and roost up aloft.

Sat., 47 days out. Chicken missing this morning; suspect Ham of stealing it—A pigeon fluttered down on deck with a green leaf fast in its gullet, and half choked; pulled leaf out; pigeon must have been somewhere else and got it; will keep to the eastward and look out for land.

Mon., 50 days out. Blowing great guns, and dismantled; under double reefs, storm spanker and fore-topmast staysail at daylight; blew away the staysail; set jib; that went too and took jibboom; cut away the wreck; she came up to the wind, caught chock, and away went the mizzenmast at the deck; cut that away, payed off in the trough of the sea, and rolled the fore and mainmast out; cleared away everything, rigged out a sea-anchor, and now we're riding it out comfortable—that is, for us; women are all sick.

Land to the eastward, small island.

60 days out. Land still in sight; gets bigger; suppose the water is going down; nothing to do now but eat, sleep, and hunt for that pug—Still riding at the sea-anchor.

100 days out. Pug must be dead—More land showing up.

150 days out. Noon—Driving on a lee shore stern foremost; getting anchors ready; sundown—let go both anchors as we got close in; dragged, and here we are, beached with every sea making a clean sweep over us; ark won't last long; getting out life raft and turning animals loose.

Next morning. Floated ashore all right; ark is breaking up and animals swimming in; last to come were that missing pug and seven half-grown pups; submit to will of providence, but still think women had the durned brute hid in the lower hold.

Next day. Poor place to live on this island—Nothing grown but a grapevine I found on the beach; will take care of it; it means grapes, and grapes mean juice, and it's been a long time between drinks—Ham is quite useful now; takes a deep interest in the vine and helps me 'tend it.

Month later. Grape is doing well.

Four months later. Grapes appearing.

Two months later. Picked the grapes; now for some wine—Ham is a model boy; did him good to rope's-end him.

Five months later. Wine has worked; will serve grog to-morrow and celebrate the anniversary of our shipwreck.

Next day. [The manuscript of this last day's entry is obscure and so incoherent as to make it strongly probable that Captain Noah served the grog as indicated, and that he wrote while under the influence of the same. There are, however, some legible references to certain "pugs," which would go to show that he still had those animals in mind and perhaps regretted his failure to effect their extinction.—Trs.] MORGAN A. ROBERTSON.

Observations.

In an attempt to add a thought to the current rhapsodizing on the conflict between Capital and Labor, I said a few weeks ago that the conflict under consideration was not one in which capital figured as an active participant—that, in fact, it was more like a squabble between laborers for the dole of wages which capital has to dispense. Everything that has since happened in the labor world appears to me to fortify that position. In some cases, as at New Orleans, laborers have proceeded to the extremity of shooting one another. Less sanguinary than these assaults, but quite as indefensible, is the course of combinations of barbers in California and New York in procuring the enactment of laws to compel other barbers to close their shops on Sunday. In the New Orleans case, to use that as a type, the invaders did their own foul work and risked the consequences; but the New York and California incapables invoke the odium theologicum and conspire with the sworn enemies of freedom to barter away the liberty of their fellow-craftsmen, and their own as well. Since the object of both kinds of invasion is the same, and since in both the appeal is to force for the destruction of free competition, it should not excite surprise if occasionally the more primitive and candid way is adopted, in which the assault is made openly and not from the barricade of a vote factory called a statehouse, nor from the ambush of a Covenanter church.

If the Arena would render its Age of Protection for Girls symposium influential with persons who are not nervous, it should reinforce the rational Helen H. Gardener by attracting contributors who assume some other than a theological or emotional attitude toward the question. It will be conceded, so far as I am concerned, that when the age indicated by nature is expunged and the attempt is made to fix another age arbitrarily, one's opinion as to what that age should be is as valuable as anybody's else, but each should be supported, when practicable, by something besides hysterical whoops. There is good reason for placing the age at fifteen, and a better one for making it twenty-five, for as years multiply, so likewise do temptations, and there is more trouble after twenty than previously. Before the epidemic of these laws spreads too wide we should pause to inquire whither we are drifting. It is argued that, if a young female may not control her property unless she has attained her majority, she assuredly may not dispose of her virtue before that time. But such argument is based on the fallacy that virtue is an inherited possession, and that it is alienable, which I deny. The analogy does not hold for a second, and if it did, what sort of people are those, anyhow, who cease to respect a woman when she becomes poor? They who insist on comparing continence with real estate must answer that question. After these laws are passed, will the prodigal daughter be received in society which thinks itself respectable, as though nothing had happened more serious than a pecuniary loss; or would we, as now, point her out as one with whom our virtuously opulent daughters will in no wise be permitted to herd? In the first case, if recklessness were not licensed, it would be condoned, and an incentive to good behavior removed. In the second, the law would not benefit her. On the contrary, if she appealed to it, it might make matters worse; for as the publicity given by the law to the fact that she has laid an egg enables us to rob her nest, so the cackle of a trial would make public property of the girl's reputation. It may be contended that the law will deter the partner in her indiscretion from committing the offense; and if experience could be subpoenaed to testify that any law of any legislature ever intervened as an offset to feminine complaisance, that contention might avail as the last possible refuge for the promoters of the present law. But I am not a visitor to this earth from some other sphere, and therefore have no occasion to inquire if the law has been observed to operate in such a case. No man has any doubts upon the subject, and any woman who has may easily have them removed. A man's conscience—which is his ethical and not his legal education—will at times govern him, and to that conscience in both men and women is due the degree of morality which now prevails; but without it the clergyman would forget the commandments, and no judge of the supreme court would respect his own decisions. There is a natural law that is efficient among savages, and even brutes, to protect the young. There are human laws for the same purpose which man might have inherited from his ancestors, which do not conflict with the natural law, and which are probably enforced with greater rigor and less partiality than any others on the statute books. It would seem that women should be at one concerning the age when they may assume their half of the responsibility for indiscretions in which they are full partners, but they are not. They differ as widely as the life and experience of one differs from that of another. When one woman, aged ninety, was asked at what date the married state ceased to be preferable, she answered the querist by saying that he would have to apply for data on that subject to some one older than herself. And there are other women of not inferior years who, if asked to state the proper age of consent, would sorrowfully make the same reply. A Michigan paper, the Detroit Tribune, in arguing against the raising of the age in that state, contends that, by making girls below eighteen legally incapable of committing the offense involved, they will be encouraged to take advantage of their immunity, but I cannot accord any legislature so much influence over natural acts as that admission would imply. If each state were to choose a different year, so that every birthday of a woman between long dresses and the shroud would somewhere in the country be protected by a law, I apprehend that the object of the law would not in any state be attained. My argument is not that any measure for the protection of the girl should be neglected, but that this one is a superfluity, since all such measures must necessarily fail when she co-operates to defeat them.

The accompanying lines evidently refer to a letter contributed to THE TRUTH SEEKER two or three weeks ago by Otto Wettstein.

"Where is the break?" friend Otto cries;
And sure 'tis hard to find
The break in such a tangled chain
Of words that won't unwind.
Hans Sachs, who sang, in years gone by,
Full many a tuneful lay,
Sought first, when he was moved to speak,
To know what he should say.
And when he knew, he'd spin it out
And always state the case.
So that the reader might enjoy
His sweet though homely phrase.
He bore in mind that Reason's line,
Or Logic's sparkling flood,
Should be so drawn, or be so poured,
That 'twould be understood.
"Where is the break?" dear Otto asks.
The answer may be found
Right here: That in his flood of words
His meaning has been drowned.
Or, if there's logic hid somewhere
Beneath those waves, I doubt,
Since time is money, if 'twill pay
The cost of dredging out.
Therefore, dear friend, relieve our brains,
Write for the common mind,
For maybe jawbreak is the "break"
That you can't seem to find.

DE L.

I give full credit, I hope, to the earnest persons who stand ready to make liberal donations toward the founding of schools from which the Bible and religious exercises shall be forever excluded. That is the kind of schools we want, and men who are willing to give money to such an object are of the right sort. But a doubt arises whether theirs is the best method of securing secular education. I have noticed in the parts of our country I have visited that children seem to be better provided with instruction than with almost anything else. When they are kept at home from lack of clothes, while their parents are taxed to support a school close at hand, which is not an unknown case, the disproportion is apparent. The school tax is a considerable burden to the citizen, and the Freethinker pays his share of it. The founding of separate and exclusive institutions of learning must of course make his burden heavier, and we would also be open to the charge, which we make against the Catholics, of being enemies of the public schools. Another thing, such institutions would probably be inferior to the schools provided by the state, because their excellence would depend on the amount of money available for their support; and as Freethinkers could not tax the community, as the state can, the means to carry them on would be limited and hard to collect. The Catholic church has tried the experiment of private or parochial schools, and from an educational point of view it is a failure. Not long ago, after a civil service examination, the rating of applicants graduated from parochial schools was compared with that of pupils of the public institutions, and it was so inferior that none of them passed. Now, if the Catholic church, with its numbers, its financial resources, and its public and private clink, cannot support schools equal to the common variety, how are a handful of Freethinkers going to do it? Such is the problem. A school may be endowed, but look at Girard College—founded by an Infidel and now controlled by Episcopalians.

But if separate schools for the children of Freethinkers could be maintained I am not sure that it would be advisable to establish them. We have a right to demand and to secure secular teaching, and secular teaching only, in the public schools which we are amerced in taxes to support. Better stand by that right than retreat and set up weak opposition. This course promises us a livelier time at less expense, and in our success we shall benefit others as well as ourselves. Another matter to be considered is that the public schools need leavening with the children of Freethinkers. The influence of such a pupil on the rest would be good for them. I shall send my boy to the public school, when he gets big enough, with instructions to protest every time religious matters are introduced. This will at least apprise the other pupils that there are two sides to the question.

I suspect the majority of Freethinkers of a practical turn of mind share the views I have herein set forth, but refrain from expressing themselves for fear of discouraging philanthropy. However, those who have cash in hand for the purposes of secular education need not return it to their pockets. The Secular Sunday-schools need it, or the Freethought Federation could make good use of it. The Truth Seeker Company likewise always has a cause or two on trial, and accomplishes results in proportion to its means. A judicious pooling of resources, a concentration of capital in the hands of those who can use it to the best advantage—in short, the providing of a Sack to be drawn upon for the expenses incidental to chasing the Bible out of the schools, would promise better returns than investment in distinctively Infidel school-houses. If the Seculars were to provide their own educational institutions, leaving orthodox Protestants in full control of the public schools, religious people would think the millennium had come for fair, and they would get altogether too gay. I would like to see the Protestant's professed devotion to learning tested in the crucible of purely secular instruction. Finally, it is to be remembered that the object of a school is to educate; that an inferior school, with or without devotional exercises, is not likely to attain that object, and that unfamiliarity with the Bible is not in itself an education. We have the schools, and they are subsidized to an extent that places them above competition. Let us proceed to secularize them.

A minister who did not want the members of his congregation to chew tobacco while he was preaching admonished the manducators as follows: "Take your quid of tobacco out of your mouth on entering the house of God, and gently lay it on the outer edge of the sidewalk or on the fence. It will positively be there when you go out, for a rat won't take it, a cat won't take it, a dog won't take it, neither will a hog; you are certain of your quid when you go after it. Not the filthiest vermin on earth would touch it." As tobacco chewing is a practice which I never adopted, I can say nothing in its defense—I have too many virtues of my own to apologize for. Still, if by some error I had sat under the droppings of the sanctuary whence the foregoing remarks emanated, I should have been impelled to observe that they applied with equal accuracy to the sermon of the preacher. He might leave his manuscript beside the chew of tobacco, and run no risk of losing it even at the hands of the Wandering Willie who should swipe the quid.

Queries.

For the exercitation of the religious mind I will ask the Christian people at large a few questions:

For a book to be inspired, must it be infallible, that is, without an error or a contradiction? If so, how can the Bible be inspired? If this world was made less than six thousand years ago, and if God always was, where was he and what was he doing all of those millions of ages before he made this world? If God is all-wise and it was an all-wise act to make this world, why did he not make it millions of years before he did? If God is a spirit without body or parts (St. John iv, 24), what was it he showed to Moses? (Ex. xxxiii, 22, 23.) If no man has seen God at any time (1 John iv, 12), who was it the children of Israel saw? (Ex. xxiv, 10, 11.) If the strength of Israel was God and he was not a man that he should repent (1 Sam. xv, 29), who was it that repented that he had made Saul King over Israel? (1 Sam. xv, 35; see also Gen. vi, 7.) If God does not tempt any man (James i, 13), who was it that tempted Abraham? (Gen. xx, 1.) If the Lord's eyes are open and can see everywhere (Job xxxiv, 21, 22), why did he have to go down to Sodom and Gomorrah to see if what he had heard was so? (Gen. xviii, 20, 21.) If God is no respecter of persons (Rom. ii, 11), why was it that he loved Jacob and hated Esau? (Rom. ix, 11-13.) If God is love (1 John iv, 16), why did he have Moses take all the people's heads and hang them up against the sun so that his fierce anger would be turned away from Israel? (Num. xxv, 4.) If Michal the daughter of Saul had no child unto the day of her death (2 Sam. vi, 23), when were her five sons born? (2 Sam. xxi, 8.)

If God was the only one who always was, and had no father nor mother, nor descendant, nor beginning of days, who was Melchisedec? (Heb. vii, 1-3.) If Cain and Abel were the only children born in their time, who was Cain's wife? (Gen. iv, 17.) If Joseph took Mary and the young child Jesus and went into Jerusalem and stayed there until after they had done all things according to the law of the Lord, and then returned into Galilee to their own city, Nazareth (Luke ii, 22-39), how could he have taken them into Egypt at the same time? (Mat. ii, 14-23.)

If flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God (1 Cor. xv, 50), how could Christ get in? (Luke xxiv, 39.) If the resurrection is to change the body from flesh and bones (1 Cor. xv, 44), why did it not change Christ's body? (Luke xxiv, 39.) If Christ was to lie three days and nights in the heart of the earth (Mat. xii, 40), why didn't he foresee his death and burial and resurrection? (Mat., Mark, Luke, and John.) If Jesus bore his own cross into a place called place of a skull when they crucified him (St. John xix, 17), how could Simon the Cyrene bear the cross to the same place at the same time? (Mat. xxvii, 32, 33, and Mark xv, 21.) Did both thieves who were crucified with Jesus revile him (Mat. xxvii, 44; Mark xv, 32), or did only one do so? (Luke xxiii, 39-43.)

If no man had ever ascended to heaven but the son of man, which was Christ (St. John iii, 13), where did Elijah go? (2 Kings ii, 11.) If the dead are not to rise (Isa. xxvi, 14), what is a resurrection? (1 Cor. xv, 52.) If Judas took the money that he got for betraying Christ and bought the field with it (Acts i, 18), how could the chief priests have taken the same money and bought the Potter's field? (Mat. xxvii, 6, 7.) If Jesus is so good and kind as to be called the meek and lowly lamb of God (St. John i, 29), and in the parable of the ten pieces of money the nobleman represents Christ, why did he want his enemies brought and killed before him? (Luke xix, 27.) Christ at a certain time told the people that what he had said would come to pass before that generation should pass away (Luke xxi, 32). Does that generation still live? If the wicked are to be burned up, root and branch, and their ashes are to be under the feet of the righteous (Mal. iv, 1, 3), how can they go to hell where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched? (Mark ix, 43 to 48.) If Christ was crucified on a cross that was carried to a place called Calvary, how could they have slain him and hanged him on a tree? (Acts v, 30; x, 39.) If it is easier for a camel to go through the needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven (Luke xviii, 23, 25), why does God make men rich? (1 Sam. ii, 7.) If a man who is hanged on a tree is accursed of God (Deut. xxi, 23), why didn't he curse Christ? (Acts x, 35.) If a man cannot see the Lord unless he is holy and without sin (Heb. xii, 14), what is to become of those church members who claim they cannot live without sinning? If all who believe that Jesus is the Christ are born of God (1 John v, 1), how can they go on and commit sin? (1 John iii, 9.) If Jesus Christ was the only begotten son of God and the only son he ever had, whose sons were they who shouted for joy when the stars sang together? (Job xxxviii, 7.) If the Bible is the good book the Christians say it is, why is it they get so angry when we show them the filthy words in it, and tell them where to find the falsehoods it contains? If the Bible is so pure a book and contains the very best of literature, what do you think of such passages of these: Lev. xv, xxi, 18, 20; Num. v, 12 to 31; Deut. xxiii, 1, 13; xxv, 11, 12; Judges xxi, 11, 12; 1 Sam. xxv, 34; Gen. xxxviii; Josh. vi, 25? Think of God saving a traitor to her people, and a common prostitute, and killing all the little innocent babes and innocent women! What can you think of such a God?

To Honor Paine's Memory.

The second annual Paine celebration is now on the road to success. The sale of tickets is progressing rapidly and more than meeting expectations. As previously announced, the fare for the round trip is fifty cents, or one-third less than regular rates. The point of destination is New Rochelle, N. Y.; the date of excursion, Decoration day, May 30; the object, to inspect the monument and the newly repaired wall, and to listen to eloquent addresses and have a sociable and royal good time. The train leaves the Grand Central depot, this city, at 10:45 A.M. Among the speakers are Henry Rowley, T. B. Wakeman, Charles H. Matchett, and the Rev. F. E. Mason. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., will preside. A general invitation has been extended to all clubs and individuals who are willing to help perpetuate the name and glory of Thomas Paine. Persons out of town may secure tickets by sending fifty cents to this office.

Good—But Was Paine Really "Coarse"?

Brother Talmage has retouched and reframed the old picture of the dying Infidel, and presented it in one of his sermons. The man is lying upon his bed, surrounded by his weeping friends, whom he forbids to pray for him. Of course, he has a little daughter, who is preternaturally bright, and who worries him with theological problems which he cannot solve. In his last moments and with his "dying breath" he demands that the death-dealing work of "Tom" Paine—no true Christian ever calls him Thomas—shall be brought and thrown upon the burning coals. It is not pretended that this "infidel" is a bad man. His wife does not suggest that he has been a bad husband or a bad citizen. His angelic daughter does not reproach him with being a bad father. His unpardonable crime seems to consist of a disbelief of certain theological notions believed by Mr. Talmage to be necessary to salvation. When this chromo was first issued it was very effective and striking. Especially when it was accompanied by that ornate and once popular fiction concerning the agonies of "Tom" Paine's death bed. But the picture is not as popular now, except in some remote country districts. Admitting, for the moment, that any belief honestly, conscientiously, and sincerely held, may imperil a man's eternal salvation, what beliefs did Mr. Paine hold that would justify such a sentence being passed upon him? This is his creed: "I believe in one God and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe in the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy." He wrote his "Age of Reason" as a check to the progress of French Atheism, fearing "lest in the general wreck of superstition, of false systems of government, and false theology, we lose sight of morality, of humanity, and of the theology that is true." Ought he to be everlastingly burned for such a creed and such a purpose? But he attacked the Bible, men say. His criticism of biblical infallibility was not as thorough as that of Robertson Smith, Dr. Briggs, or Rev. Heber Newton. He was coarse and flip-pant! So he was, too often. It was a coarse age. But if coarseness be an unpardonable sin, the Rev. Sam Jones may indulge the hope of a future acquaintance with Mr. Paine. The author of the "Age of Reason" was not coarser than the men who "answered him," or lampooned him, or satirized him. One thing is certain. If Thomas Paine is in hell because of his religious opinions, George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson are in his company. Because they all shared his opinions. If he is condemned to that dolorous region because he published his opinions, then we are called to face the logical conclusion, which I think not even Mr. Talmage would sustain, that only the orthodox have the divine right to speak their honest convictions. Sensible people, of all shades of belief, are getting tired of these agonizing "death-bed scenes." If Voltaire and Paine both recanted in the last moments of life, what of it? It is wiser to judge a man by the beliefs of his last ten years rather than by those of his last ten minutes. —Rev. John Snyder, in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Origin of Sunday Laws.

It is well to remember that Sunday observance laws are distinctively a survival of slave times and of the union of church and state. The first one, a decree of the Emperor Constantine, had both a civil and a religious purpose, a state and a church policy, in view—to secure the slaves a rest of one day in seven, and to commemorate the resurrection by supplanting observance of the Jewish Sabbath with a Christian observance of the first day of the week exclusively. The idea of securing a day of rest for slaves was so prominent in the earlier Saxon Sunday laws that they set free any slave who worked on Sunday at the command of his master.

When our fathers made federal and state constitutions divorcing church and state and forbidding the enactment of laws respecting an establishment of religion, the power was taken away from our legislatures to prohibit the free exercise of religious observances, or to impose such observances on any part of our people.

But the land was then still full of slaves and persons bound to service for terms of years, and to protect these rather than to enforce the church policy of the Byzantine emperor and impose a Christian observance upon non-Christians, the old Sunday laws were retained.

Their enforcement has always been necessarily subject to the most inconsistent exemptions, and is now. By common consent, rather than through any fear of the law, Sunday is observed as a day of rest and relaxation by all who can afford it, with or without religious incentive, and in order that they may do so multitudes of servants, and of those who minister to the daily wants and comforts of the public, are compelled and permitted to work on that day, taking some other day of rest.

The customs, wants, and business necessities of the people mark the proper line of exemptions in the enforcement of this law, and now, when slavery is abolished, among these exemptions should be included as "works of charity and necessity" everything that ministers to the wholesome or harmless enjoyment of the day by the masses. To push the enforcement of Sunday laws any further than this is to subject the community to a church discipline and church rule for which there is no warrant in our constitutions or in the precepts or example of the founder of Christianity.—S. W., in the New York World.

Negation.

How frail is life, that as a tongue of light
Swept by a breeze has vanished in the night!
"The form is cold, and stilled the throbbing heart,"
In these few words our knowledge we impart.
'Tis all that's known, and to that silent shore
The shrinking pilgrim has no pilot o'er.
Alone, in utter loneliness, alone
We pass from life into the dark unknown.
Hope sees a star and prateeth of a Name,
But Wisdom murmurs of his dubious fame.
We search the past to find the sacred text:
One age has stoned the prophets of the next;
Alas! they failed to see the hand divine,
Nor read the import of the warning sign.
Faith came at bidding of Tradition's word,
Nor to the eye that saw or ear that heard.
Go, peer into the empty eyeless skull,
And from the vacuum thine own inference cull;
'Tis gone, whate'er it was, it is not there,
Flown is its mirth and perished its despair.
Did love give birth, or a divine decree
Teach us to dream of immortality?
Lo! we have placed him in the silent tomb,
But further trace is lost amid the gloom.
We lift a prayer against the barren sky
And strive to pierce it with the mortal eye;
The prayer is echoed back into the night,
Dim is the star where hope receives her light.
Baffled, and bound unto a narrow sphere,
He looked beyond, but death has met him here.
We know no more; the form is calm and chill,
And he who alone might answer lieth still.

LOUIS LASH.

The Pope and Rome.

That is a queer announcement which comes from Rome that the pope will resent any participation in the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entry of the Italians into Rome or even any congratulations to the Italian government upon that fact "as injurious and insulting to the pontiff and the holy see."

It is really about time that his holiness ceased to harp on that particular string. It is true that his predecessors did govern Rome, and they did it very badly. The "states of the church" that used to figure in the geographies were very injurious to the reputation of the church for ability and integrity. In those days Rome was run by a kind of sacerdotal Tammany, and the beginning of any Roman municipal reform movement must have been directed at the papal ring.

In the second place, twenty-five years is too long for anybody to keep on complaining of a grievance which is perfectly certain of not being redressed. Whoever keeps it up so long is a bore. The present pope had an excellent opportunity to strengthen the church in Italy by dropping the subject, which his predecessor could scarcely have been expected to drop. By continuing to nag the Italian government the pope has forced every Italian to choose between being a good Italian and being a good Catholic—with results very disastrous to the church.—New York Times.

There could be nothing more unreasonable or more unjust than the oppression of the Sunday laws upon the people in this city. It was well said by a recent visitor that a stranger can do nothing in New York on Sunday except go to church or walk the streets. No man can drive to one of the park restaurants for dinner on Sunday and order with his meal even a pint of claret. No man can play a game of billiards in the most orderly hall in the town on Sunday without fear of arrest. In a score of other ways the reasonable liberty of the citizen is restrained by laws whose very existence is in violation of the fundamental principles of our system of government. Yet whenever an effort is made to secure the repeal of laws which thus prescribe religious observances with which the state has properly nothing to do, it is defeated by the hypocrisy of rural legislators who have themselves no hesitation in playing poker on Sunday and selling their votes on week days, but who impress their virtue upon their constituents by their official championship of laws for the observance of "holy time." —World.

In our issue of March 23d we quoted from the American Sentinel the statement that "Robert G. Ingersoll declares that he believes it his conscientious duty to lecture against it [the Bible] for the gate receipts minus the expenses." We mildly criticized this expression and asked the editor when and where Colonel Ingersoll had said anything of the kind. The editorial writer of the paragraph excepted to, Mr. A. F. Ballenger, promptly and handsomely responds:

In our issue of March 14th, we had occasion to denounce the persecution of Robert G. Ingersoll by certain clergymen of Hoboken, N. J., who revived an old statute against blasphemy, and attempted thereby to prevent Mr. Ingersoll from delivering his lecture against the Bible. In this article we carelessly attributed a mercenary motive to Mr. Ingersoll. This was unjust, both to Mr. Ingersoll and the Sentinel. The Sentinel had no power, no occasion, and no right to sit in judgment on the motives of any man.

We are pleased to read these frank words, even if the Adventist editor thinks that he penned them because he is a Christian—we should say that it was because he is a man, something much more desirable and noble, in our estimation. What we refer to here is this concluding part of the correction:

The Sentinel is Christian, and Christ said: "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world."

But our Christian friend is surely aware that the Bible puts into the mouth of Jesus words which express sentiments directly the opposite of that which he finds in the declaration he has quoted. Jesus called many of his auditors "hypocrites," a "generation of vipers," and other equally opprobrious names, and told them that they were "cursed" and should go away into everlasting fire. Was not this judging men?

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

MR. EDITOR: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to Mr. H. B. Day, and "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" as per premium offer. We will use it together. Inclosed find $3.60. Send me three copies Ingersoll's "About the Holy Bible."
S. J. STRICKLAND.

BUTTE CITY, MONT., April 23, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I will avail myself of your liberal offer. Inclosed find $3, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book."
With wishes for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, yours for liberty,
T. D. HYNDS.

HAVERHILL, MASS., April 23, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6. Send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to F. E. Croston, and also mail him the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and send me the paper for one year and the same book. The doctor's book has come; he is more than pleased with it. S. C. SABIN.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARK., April 24, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: The book I want is the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." Please send me the paper also for one year. I am very favorably impressed with it; did not know there was such a paper published. I have just read the "Age of Reason." Yours truly,
A. J. FREEMAN.

SELIAD, CAL., April 27, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Here comes Robert Rainey with his $3 for the "Text-Book" and the paper for one year.

And still the world moves; and Thomas Paine's works and Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," if rightly studied, will surely revolutionize the world.
JAS. W. M. HAMPTON.

CLEVELAND, O., April 28, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Please enter my name for one year and Watson Heston's "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." Also send me "Design Fallacies," "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle," "The Giant Delusion," "Science vs. Religion," and ANNUAL. Inclosed please find $3.70. Your friend, FRED. W. MORLOCK.

RIVER FALLS, WIS., May 1, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.25—$3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, with the "Pictorial Text-Book," and $1.25 for the pamphlets named.

I am a poor old man, and it is very hard times for money, but I want to hear from Mr. Putnam as often as I can while he is on the other side of the Atlantic. And I want very much to hear all about the trial of Mr. Wise; and, in fact, I want to read THE TRUTH SEEKER generally, and I don't think I could possibly have spared the money now only to get the "Pictorial Text-Book" free. I want a good many books and will get them as fast as I can.

Ever for truth and the right, I remain while I live, as firm as the rock of ages,
Respectfully yours,
L. L. RICHARDSON.

CONNELLSVILLE, PA., April 21, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3. Send THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I like your paper because of its aggressive fight against theocratic despotism. I think you are deserving of all praise and the hearty support of Liberals in your uncompromising warfare upon the enemies of our secular government.

I am not a new recruit in the ranks of Liberalism, but a tough veteran; have been a Liberal all my life, and expect to remain one to the finish.

Those pictures of Heston's are amusing to old and tried Freethinkers, but in my opinion their effects upon the minds of those who are just becoming emancipated from the fetters of orthodoxy are not all we would wish. Although sick and tired of religion, it seems to me some of those cartoons repel rather than attract. But perhaps some need the truth presented to them just that way. I am but a lowly toiler bound in the treadmill of an unjust competitive system which I hope to see destroyed by co-operation. I have to work six days in the week, and even violate the whole or a part of the sacred day in order to keep up with the procession.

But I favor any just and truthful work that will, in the words of the glorious old colonel, "free men's minds from the fetters of a degrading faith." H. AUSTIN.

He Wants Some Good Books.

OSBORN, O., April 20, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7.05 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the books listed.
CHAS. McKINNEY.

It Beats the Preacher.

HAMBURG, CAL., April 19, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and the $2.75 Badge-pin. Times are hard here at present, and I am poor, though I think I am as honest as the common run of sky-pilots, and I am still studying the contents of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It beats the pulpit-pounder.

JAS. W. M. HAMPTON.

Helping Mr. Fleckten.

LINDEN, MICH., April 25, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I send you $6; $5 for my subscription for two years, and $1 to help Mr. Fleckten keep the flag above the Bible.

I should like to have heard Mr. Putnam when he lectured at Red Jacket.

There was a priest here getting members for a colony in Canada. Many Canadians and good Catholic dupes are now coming back, and those who had no money are having to foot it. EZRA GLADDING.

He Wishes to Be Well-Informed.

FREDONIA, N. Y., April 29, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.25 for a continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the ANNUAL for 1895.

I must continue my subscription to your valuable paper or else be left in the dark concerning the events that occur all around us. Its shining pages tell what our friends are doing to hold aloft the banner of the free and at the same time keep us posted regarding what the enemies of Freethought are doing to trample the flag of our country in the dust of superstition.

PLINY SMITH.

Eight to One.

STEINMAN, OR., April 15, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I read "Maria Monk" several years ago, but I got this one for a friend of mine who is a Catholic, and I am glad to say that he has given up his church and is an earnest Freethinker. There are only nine men in this place (a railroad town), and eight of them are Freethinkers. I think that is quite a record breaker.

You will please excuse me for writing such a long letter, but I had to tell you about our humble efforts to help the great cause.
HARRY DUNDAS.

He Was Always a Freethinker.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., April 13, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: As my subscription is almost out again, and I don't wish to miss one number, I send in time. I have been taking the paper some fifteen years, and it has been getting better all the time. I received "Four Hundred Years" some time ago and am ever so well pleased with the book. Every Freethinker should have one. Please send two of Paine's "Common Sense," one ANNUAL, and one "Liberal Hymn Book." I send you $5; $1 is for the Wise Fund. I hope he may beat them.

I was born April 15, 1815, so I am four-score years. I have been a Freethinker all my life, and hope all will be before another twenty years.

Yours as ever, LEONARD WALTERS.

"We Learn to Do by Doing."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., March 31, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I would like to assist you in some of your aggressive and defensive enterprises, but it seems to me like a hopeless case. Freethinkers are not yet numerically strong enough to influence the lawmakers. Christian statesmen will be likely to make laws favoring their religion, notwithstanding arguments and petitions to the contrary.

J. B. Wise I am sorry for, but no matter how the case is decided, it will be a Freethought victory. Remember also that "the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church." We must wait till the people get educated.
E. O. TUTTLE.

[No, we must not wait until the people get to be educated—we must educate them.—ED. T. S.]

He Shocked the Orthodox Farmers.

ADRIAN, April 29, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send $2, one each for the J. P. Wise and Fleckten Funds. I wish every Liberal and Freethinker who has a dollar to spare would lend a hand to help fight the battle for freedom. I don't expect to be able much longer to help the cause; am old and feeble and am anxious to do what I can while I stay. I was reading in one of our secular papers just now of Mr. Richard Rogers, who at a farmers' club introduced the subject of taxing church property. He was the only one in favor, while others had never thought on the subject, it being an orthodox crowd. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER and pamphlet "Church Property," or whatever else you have, to help the discussion, as it will be likely to come up again, as the farmers often meet and discuss different topics. Mr. Rogers is an intelligent man and well-to-do farmer.
Truly yours, CAROLINE L. RICH.

He Was Not Entirely Serious.

RUTLAND, VT., May 6, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Concerning my letter in your paper of May 4th, you remark: "If friend Orcutt will read Mr. Severance's letter again, he will see that the latter gentleman did not buy a pew in a church, but a pew from a dismantled church, and so the remark about 'playing the hypocrit' is hardly apposit." I am glad you said this, for it had not occurred to me that I had been careless and seemed to take Mr. Severance seriously. I did not mean to be understood as calling him a hypocrit, personally, but to emphasize the fact I understood him to set forth, namely, that it is almost impossible for any person to prosper, under our present social system, without playing the part of the hypocrit.

Another point I desired to make was that the real sin one commits in gambling does not consist, as our long-faced God-worshippers teach, in the act of playing with cards, or shaking dice, because such practice leads to bad habits, but consists in the act of the winner taking that which does not belong to him—that for which he has performed no service.

A. A. ORCUTT.

Has His Eyes Open.

VICTOR, COL., April 10, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which send me "Men, Women, and Gods;" ANNUAL; "The Foolishness of Prayer," and "Jingles and Prose."

I am like many others: I love THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I move about so much that I cannot always subscribe, but buy it at news-stands when they keep it. I have often wished to write of a find I made in Kansas at a little station north of Winfield; I have forgotten the name. I was walking between the main tracks and noticed a piece of slate that had been thrown off an engine, sparkling in the sunlight just after a shower of rain. On picking it up I saw one side was partly covered with a petrified mat resembling rag carpet; the filling, or woof, was of bark. On trying to break off one end all the impression fell off. It is something to think of. The coal was mined in Kansas, but where I don't know. I was also in Guatemala and Spanish Honduras, C. A., last summer and went to see the old ruins of Chepulco in Guatemala, and those of Capon in Honduras. There were large monuments with written histories of dynasties. But who can read them in this age? My regards to THE TRUTH SEEKER family.

JAMES MIDDLETON.

How They do Love One Another!

May 2, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: St. Louis was in an uproar on Sunday over an editorial in THE Western Watchman, a Roman Catholic paper edited by Father Phelan, pastor of one of the St. Louis Catholic churches. The editorial savagely denounced the Christian Endeavor societies and Epworth Leagues as instrumentalities of social corruption. The following extract gives the flavor of Father Phelan's pronouncement:

The associations of Christian Endeavor and the Epworth League number over 100,000 young men and women. Every one of them expects, hopes, and labors to get married. They are actively engaged in courting and flirting when not most actively busy in singing and praying. These young people are very much in each other's company. These two associations go off from home thousands of miles, and stay weeks away from the parental roof, with no one to protect them from the wiles of the vicious. Last summer 30,000 people met in a large city in the East and stayed huddled together in hotels and private houses for two whole weeks. These 30,000 people were actually courting, flirting, etc., and they were thrown into promiscuous company, and free to roam at their own sweet will whithersoever their passion might lead. The corrupting tendency of such heterogeneous gatherings of young people cannot be overestimated, and for downright viciousness and depravity they have never been equaled since the horrid saturnalia of Greece and Rome.

Every observing person may draw his own inferences concerning Father Phelan's remarks against the Christian Endeavorers. What he says may be true in a measure, and we may also, in a large measure, consider his remarks as the outcome of jealous bigotry which has always characterized religious denominations. LOOKER-ON.

A Good Word for Mr. Wise.

COUNCIL GROVE, KAN., April 18, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I am glad to be able to respond to your request to delinquents to send something on subscription, and you will find inclosed $3.

I do not think your paper has many readers more fully in accord with its editorial matter than myself. I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years, and in all that time have seen but few things in its editorial columns that I could not fully indorse. Can say as much, too, for the "Observations." But I think there is an occasional slip-over in the "Letters of Friends" department, and while there are some splendid letters among them, I think, on the whole, the paper would do more good if the space taken up by that department were filled with other matter, say an extra editorial and a few more of Brother George's "Observations."

I think the cartoons are a good feature. I especially enjoyed Mr. Reed's article in the issue of April 20th, on the "Remedy for Political Ills." But I do not believe a Freethought journal should give space to discussions of political questions.

I recently moved here from near Clay Center, Kan., and am personally acquainted with J. B. Wise. He is an earnest worker in our cause; a man of good character, and deserves and needs the financial support of the Freethought fraternity in his coming trial. I am not much acquainted here yet. If you have other subscribers than myself here I would like you to let me know their names. I secured Bell and others for lectures at Oak Hill while living there, and they did much good. Shall stir the animals up here later on.

W. D. GWIN.

Female Influence.

LEXINGTON, KY., April 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just had the pleasure of hearing a lecture on woman suffrage, by Mrs. J. K. Henry. She is a candidate for the office of superintendent of public schools. Miss Laura Clay, a most charming lady and philanthropist, indorsed briefly what she said. It is easy to prove that women have the right to vote, and none but tyrants would wish to deny them the privilege. The moment this right is recognized her influence will become very great, and badly do the schools need the exercise of her power.

Mrs. Henry is in favor of mental freedom, and will never wish to "prejudice the mind of a child." As the child is the father of the man, of course, the future of our country lies folded in that bud.

The situation is just this: All our schools are Sunday-schools, and Protestants are the very ones who wish to have it so. Our children ought to have a thorough scientific education.

If the subject of religion is introduced into the public school, to the detriment, as we think, of the mind of the child, it will be done by a sneaking company of artful wire-pullers, who will spice their catechisms with spurious political theories. Thousands of cowardly and weak-minded people will allow their children's heads to be crammed with lies and silly tales about spooks and witches, when they ought to be studying their grammar and history, thus causing this variegated republic to be the laughing-stock of the world another thousand years.

In many countries religion is supported by the state, but the people are not forced to go to church, are not persecuted. Women should no longer be "like dumb driven cattle." People like to be ruled by tricksters in this frivolous century. Soon the children will be handed over to knaves and our lovely land to Abaddon. Let the secular schools drag along—at your peril!

Respectfully, ALHAZA.

Happy Because They Were Happy.

LAKE GENEVA, WIS., April 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In a late number of your paper I read an account of a minister of the gospel explaining that Cain got his wife from his father-in-law's house, and being asked whereabouts Cain's father-in-law's house was, answered, "I don't know; I wasn't there!" How surprising! Things that are almost considered impossibilities may sometimes happen! Here is actually a minister who tells the truth about something in the Bible. How much better it would be if all preachers were equally honest! To almost any question concerning the Bible, they might give the same truthful answer, for instance:

Question: "Did ever a God make a man of dust and a woman of one of his ribs?"

Answer: "I don't know; I wasn't there."

Q. "Did ever a God expose a certain part of himself to a man on a mountain?"

A. "I don't know; I wasn't there."

Q. "Was ever a virgin found with child of the Holy Ghost?"

A. The same.

Q. Is there a heaven? Is there a hell? The same answer fits. How much better it would be if preachers were to tell what they know, instead of what they don't know, though I suppose the average minister would be able to say but mighty little in that case. Still, even now they are of some benefit. I always feel better after listening to a red-hot hell-fire sermon; I feel happy and thankful that I am not built that way, that I cannot believe their absurd fables. The average preacher's sermon resembles what Macbeth says about life: "It is a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." The following translated extract from a Lutheran priest's sermon shows the profound depth of their observations: "And behold! my beloved brethren, I proclaim unto you there was joy in Jerusalem! and wherefore, my beloved brethren, wherefore was there joy in Jerusalem? Verily! it was because they were joyful!"

Yours truly, EMIL JOHNSON.

One of Nature's Noblemen.

DWIGHT, ILL., April 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $10, for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and "Cosmian Hymn Book." I had written to you to discontinue our TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Johnson thinking he was too sick to read any more, but I don't feel as if I could keep house without it. Mr. Johnson died on the 13th of April; he had been sick a year and a half. He had been afflicted with a fever sore since he was fourteen years of age; had been a great sufferer all through life, but was always very patient and cheerful. He was a great reader; read the daily papers until two days before his death. He was confined to his bed about four months and suffered intense pain, and often said he wished he might pass quietly away, and his wish was granted at last. He had no fear of death whatever or of hell. He thought it was as natural to die as it was to be born. His friends often made the remark, "You wait until you get on your death-bed, then you will change." But he never experienced that change. He always enjoyed life superbly when not in bodily pain, and was happy with his little family. He leaves a wife and one daughter fourteen years old to mourn his loss, five boys having gone before, four dying within the short space of two weeks with that dreaded disease, scarlet fever. He was born in Sterling, Conn., and was in his sixty-ninth year. He came West when twenty-four years of age; was a book-agent fifteen years; later his occupation was farming; and at the time of his death he was a retired farmer. Franklin Steiner delivered the funeral address, which was very appropriate and satisfactory. He also read a biography of Mr. Johnson, written by Rev. O. W. Pollard, an ex-Methodist minister. He was called an honest man by all, and one not afraid to speak his mind at all times and in all places. He had been a staunch Freethinker all his life. His funeral was largely attended by people of all denominations.

Mrs. T. J. JOHNSON.

The Effect of United and Aggressive Freethought.

PALMER, MASS., April 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: One day, as I was pondering over the subject of traditions, etc., these sweetly solemn thoughts occurred to me and I thought THE TRUTH SEEKER readers might enjoy thinking of them also:

Bono Deo! Bono Diavolo! Bono Tempore! What a jolly kick-up, rumpus, and breaking up there would be of theological cliques and clans if all the Liberals, Freethinkers, Atheists, and Infidels of this land of boasted freedom should combine their forces! Donner and blitz! what a grand upheaval would arise from a thorough shaking of the sacerdotal robes. Hi jingo! just think for a moment what would happen if the Freethinkers took enough interest in the matter to organize and to promulgate their gospel broadcast like unto the Young Men's Christian Associations or Christian Endeavorites. But the Freethinker has no hopes of a future parasitical existence to spur him on, and so the Age of Reason struggles slowly forward. Occasionally some doctor of divinity sees the error of his course and breaks away quite heretically as well as heroically.

I notice some of your correspondents criticize your cartoons. Now, I should like to have a word to say in their favor. I consider them the most spicy and interesting part of your paper. Always bear it in mind that the Americans are a people who love to be amused as well as instructed, and of the two I believe they prefer the amusement. How many are there, for Christ's sake, who will carefully read through Professor Totten's chronology or chronological tables? Very few, I ween. Even the dignified supporters of the churches recognize the fact that the people must be amused part of the time in order to be made more docile and submissive to the laborious process of swallowing the story of Adam and Eve's apple. The plagues of Egypt also come in for their share of the ramming process. The superstitious infants accept without a squall the tale of Moses in the bulrushes. The pitiful tale of Christ's crucifixion is well calculated to excite the sympathies of unquestioning hearers, but a study of the whole career of Christ's life fails to convince us of the divinity of that man. We might accept his priestly origin without a murmur, but as for his heavenly origin, murmur we must theret, hoping that we are not necessarily murmuring against any of the celestial beings. Trusting you will continue the manufacture of those spicy cartoons, in which we can read the truth at a glance, I remain an unbeliever of the revelation as revealed by the Bible.

LEONTIDAS ANDERSON.

Good Places for Missionary Work.

LEON, IA., April 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Twice each year I visit Van Wert, Ia., and invariably have a discussion with some one and sometimes half a dozen in the hotel concerning the Bible and religion, and I finally got the proprietor, Mr. T. Price, to agree to take THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months. He told me a few days ago that every time the paper comes now there is a hustle among the boarders to see which one can get it first, and I see there is a letter in a late issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER from S. K. Dennis, of Van Wert, which shows that my efforts at that place have not been entirely fruitless, and I hope that when I make my next visit to that town I may secure one or two subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I believe a little sensible talk and a few copies of the paper in almost any hotel will in course of time free the minds of the priest-ridden souls who only need a taste of truth to get them to like it. How could a bird know that it would like freedom if it had always been shut up in a cage? How can a man know the enjoyment there is in seeing if he was born blind?

Let us anoint their eyes with a little reason, and some of them will gradually open; and in course of time they will see clearly and will be useful and happy.

I suggest that every Freethinker who can use his brain and tongue to good advantage should do so, for you will sometimes sprout a seed of reason and start it growing where there at first appears to be none.

But there are many good, honest Christian men and women who are intelligent, and who would be reasoners if they only had their little seed of reason sprouted. But we must not be discouraged because we cannot accomplish this in one conversation. It sometimes takes many conversations, and sometimes months and years, to reform a man. It was so with myself. For many months I was afraid to allow myself to think a free and unfettered thought, and when I did allow my mind to think freely for a few minutes I would immediately afterwards imagine that I heard the fires of hell snapping in my ears.

I suggest that each and every man, who possibly can, send one dollar's worth of TRUTH SEEKERS to some hotel, for there they will be sure to fall into the hands of some one who will in time be benefited thereby, and by and by he will become free to think without the fear of hell, and become a worker in the cause of Freethought. Of course many seeds will fall on poor soil, and be wasted; but some will fall on good soil, and bring forth fruits abundantly. I have done a great deal of talking, and spent a little money in buying and circulating Freethought literature, and am now beginning to see the fruits of my labors. I have written a little book entitled "The Old Spook Story; or, Promiscuous Blisters on the Bible," and as soon as I am able will have a few thousand copies printed, one or two thousand copies of which I intend to give away, and would like to sell enough to get my money back. I did not write it for financial gain, but for the good I hope it may do. When I am no longer here I want some people to be benefited because I have been.

Let this be the aim of all and the world will be better, and we will die better satisfied with our lives.

FRANK COOK.

What! The Infidel Slayer in Gotham.

NEW YORK, April 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: An elderly gentleman with a growth of whiskers resembling the pictures of Bible characters, spoke at the Young Men's Christian Association building, Twenty-third street, at four o'clock, Sunday, April 28th, on the "Mistakes of Moses." This defender of Moses comes from Boston and gives his name as H. L. Hastings. He has some trinkets and charms with him in the form of five and ten cent pamphlets, which he labels with the pugnacious name of "Anti-Infidel Library."

There sat on the platform some secretaries of the Young Men's Christian Association who winked sanctimoniously when a point seemed to be scored by the speaker in defense of Moses. One of these followers offered a prayer in which it was not difficult to see, by the aid of the imagination, the slimy tail of the serpent of Infidelity, from the believers' point of view. It was evident the prayer was intended to make gods and men shudder.

The speaker scoffed at the advanced thought of the day and would have the young men who heard him accept Moses' notions of the origin and formation of the earth in preference to the discoveries and splendid generalizations of the geologists, astronomers, chemists, and thinkers of the present age. In other words, he prefers the crude imaginings of Moses to the scientific discoveries of the best and ablest men now living or dead. With him it is Moses against Darwin, Spencer, Humboldt, Haeckel and such men. He prefers Moses, because Moses did not know enough to say "I do not know" and stick to it until he did know, but, merely to make his fellow savages think him wise, attributed the existence of things to an act of creation by the three letters G-o-d.

I was at Barnum & Bailey's show the other night, where in the ethnological congress are semi-nude savages, with minds superstitious and uncultured. They jumped about one another on a platform, wielding and clicking war clubs for the amusement of the upturned pale faces. Now, I suppose that Moses was just about such a fellow as one of those savage chiefs, only his skin may not have been of exactly the same shade. As Colonel Ingersoll says, no doubt anyone of those beings could tell all about the beginning and formation of everything in nature, or if they have not well defined notions of their own, they would probably without hesitation accept Moses' notions of creation.

Why do Mr. Hastings and other like survivals continue to afflict an enlightened public with such doctrines, perhaps supposing they are taken seriously? I will tell. The populace are not such a lot of fools as he wants to take them to be, and the average citizen to-day is on the lookout for plausible theological lies. The owners of stocks and bonds in a business undertaking are not going to see their means of subsistence deteriorated in value by anything that can be said, if they can help it. So with the church. It is a business enterprise in which untaxed millions are invested and the certificates of stock are the Holy Bible, Moses, creation, God—such words with or without meaning—and the parties in interest, if they can help it, are not going to see their means of subsistence depreciated by anything that can be said.

When will Moses' friends give this tired world a rest, so as to let us think of something else besides refuting their twaddle? Answer, Mr. Hastings. L. D. CRINE.

Dolly's Lesson.

Come here, you nigramus!
I'm 'shamed to hav to 'fess
You don't know any letter
'Cept just your cookie S.

Now listen, and I'll tell you—
This round hole's name is O,
And when you put a tail in
It makes it Q, you know.

And if it has a front door
To walk in at, it's C.
Then make a seat right here
To sit on, and it's G.

And this tall letter, dolly,
Is I, and stands for me;
And when it puts a hat on,
It makes a cup o' T.

And curly I is J, dear,
And half of B is P.
And E without his slippers on
Is only F, you see!

You turn A upside downwards,
And people call it V;
And if it's twins, like this one,
W 'twill be.

Now, dolly, when you learn 'em,
You'll know a great big heap—
Most much's I—O dolly!
I b'lieve you've gone asleep!

A Boy's Worst Foe.

Don't send my boy where your girl can't go
And say, "There's no danger for boys, you know, Because they all hav their wild oats to sow."
These is no more excuse for my boy to be low
Than your girl. Then please do not tell him so.

Don't send my boy where your girl can't go,
For a boy or a girl sin is sin, you know,
And my baby boy's hands are as clean and white,
And his heart is as pure as your girl's to-night.
—Woman's Voice.

Auleta.

Auleta Irving, although a pretty child, could not be called really beautiful. Yet her mother, who loved her best because she knew her best, would look upon her asleep in her little bed at night, and say: "Keren Happuch" (Hebrew for child of beauty). She called her thus less on account of any external beauty, than because of her disposition, which was indeed very sweet. She was thoroughly unselfish, and very affectionate. Living in an atmosphere of love, a heaven at home, she knew not the meaning of hate or envy. She loved every one, and all things. When she was six years old her mamma was taken very ill. For a time her life was in the greatest danger. She finally, however, recovered sufficiently to leave her couch the greater part of the day. She could even walk about the house at times, but gained no farther than this.

At length the physician ordered her abroad. "She will never recover health and strength here," he asserted. Mrs. Whitney, a half-sister of Mr. Irving, consented for a certain sum to take charge of Auleta. Mrs. Irving's mind was weak and unbalanced by her illness, or she would never have consented to such an arrangement. Mr. Irving thought only of his wife's recovery. So Auleta went from a home of love to an abode almost directly the opposite. Here she was forced to learn to hate, and to envy children who had their mamma with them. She arrived here in the evening. "Won't you kiss me good-night?" she asked of Mrs. Whitney, after she had been put to bed.

"Kiss you good-night! What for, I should like to know? If you think I'm going to hav any such nonsense as that in this house, you are grandly mistaken."

Auleta looked up greatly surprised, saying: "Mamma always did, except when she was too sick."

"I don't know as I am obliged to be a fool because she was."

"My mamma wasn't a fool, and you musn't say so any more."

"I shall say what I please, miss. Ain't you going to say your prayers?"

"Say my prayers! What is that?"

"Oh, such awful ignorance! It's a lucky thing that your ma was sick so you could come to some one who would teach you something. Don't know anything about God, I suppose?"

"No."

Mrs. Whitney then commenced a long disquisition in which she gave Auleta the information that God made the world, made her, made everything. This and much more. Before it was ended Auleta was asleep. The next night she was made to say the usual:

"Now I lay me" etc.

One day she put the very common query, "Who made God?"

"I don't suppose anyone made him," was the reply.

"He couldn't make himself," remarked Auleta.

"Of course not. He always existed, I suppose."

"Then perhaps the world did."

"No, it didn't; God made everything except himself."

"I should think some one would have had to make God, and some one else made the one who made God, and so on."

"Well, they didn't."

"I don't see how you know. God is he, you said?"

"Yes, of course."

"I should think it would be more polite to say Mr. God. Isn't there a Mrs. God?"

"Oh, my goodness; did I ever hear the like before? Of course not."

"I should think there ought to be."

"Well there hadn't."

Auleta mused awhile, then asked: "Did Mr. God make the sky out of toadstools, then paint it blue?"

Mrs. Whitney held up her hands, and with horror depicted in her countenance, gasped out, "For mercy's sake don't ask me any more questions." Some time afterward Auleta queried: "What is heaven?"

"A nice place above the sky which God made for good people and children, not the bad ones."

"Did Mr. God—"

"Don't say Mr. God, say just God."

"I think Mr. sounds better than just."

"Oh, dear me. I didn't mean you should say just, but say God without any Mr. or anything else before it."

"Oh. But that don't sound quite polite."

"I can't help it."

"Where do bad people and children go when they die?"

"To an awful bad place called hell."

"You say I am a naughty girl. Am I too naughty to go to heaven?"

"Yes, you are."

"Well, I ain't half so bad and mean as God is, for I would make everyone good, and a beautiful heaven for them; and no bad people and children, and no bad place."

"You awful wicked girl. You shut up now, and don't ask me any more questions either for one while. Get your hat and we'll go to walk."

"You love me a little, don't you, or you wouldn't take me to walk."

"No, I don't. I take you to walk because your father told me to every day when it was pleasant weather."

Auleta could scarcely repress her sobs, and did so only by the greatest effort. It was so hard not to be loved any. She was silent during the walk, and it was a long time before she ventured to again question Mrs. Whitney.

One day after much soliloquizing she asked:

"What do people do in heaven?"

"Kneel, play on harps, and sing," was the reply.

"All the time?"

"I suppose so."

"And you call that a nice place. I don't. Why, I'd get so tired I wouldn't know what to do. I don't want to go there, I am sure."

"There is no danger. You needn't worry."

"Too bad, am I?"

"Yes."

"Then I'll keep on being bad."

"Oh, you terrible child!"

"What do they do in hell?"

"Serve the devil, and"—she was going to add, "write in the flames," but for some reason went no farther.

"And what?" Auleta asked.

"No matter."

"Who is the devil?"

"A fallen angel."

"A fallen angel. What made him fall? Where did he fall from?"

"I shan't answer any more questions."

"Please tell me that." Mrs. Whitney shut her lips very firmly together and would not open them to say more. Some time after this Auleta again questioned:

"Is every one that's good, kind?"

"Yes."

"Then you are not good, for you are hardly ever kind; and I am sorry, for unless hell is a monstrous big place where we could live apart, I don't think we both ought to go there."

"What an awful child you are. Don't I take all the care of you?"

"Yes, because you are paid for doing it. Not because you are kind, and love me."

"Of course I don't love such a bad child as you are. I don't know who could?"

"My mamma could. She thinks it makes people good to love them."

"I don't believe she'll love such a terrible bad girl as you've got to be, if she lives to ever come home, which is doubtful."

The thought that her mamma might not love her she never entertained for a moment, an instant even. She clasped her hands convulsively together, and turned an agonized face toward the door, through which she would have wildly fled. But her papa stood there; and by his side her mamma, once more well, both mentally and physically. She held out her arms to Auleta and she sprang into them.

SADIE ATHENA MAGOON.

LITTLE CHARLIE (not quite four) was caught doing something naughty. His mother called him into the house and asked him to tell her how it happened, and all about it. He told very little but when she asked a question would answer. Finally, she said, "Charlie, you might as well tell me, for I can see by your eyes if you do not speak the truth." "Well, mamma," said he, "I'll just let my eyes tell it, for I'm so tired," and he leaned up against her and rested and told no more.

Correspondence.

BUCKLEY, WASH., April 20, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I am eleven years old, and go to school every day. I study reading, writing, arithmetic, history, physiology, grammar, geography, and spelling. I am in the intermediate department. My teacher's name is Grace E. Moore; she is a good teacher, and I like her very much. I used to go to Sunday-school, but do not go now; I would rather stay home on Sundays.

Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time and I always read the Children's Corner. I will send a piece of poetry my brother was going to speak in school, but his teacher would not let him; she said she did not like pieces about the devil. Our school will end the 17th of May and I am real sorry, for I like to go to school and do not stay out of school a day unless I have to; I have been tardy only once and absent once. School ends with some exercises, and the program will be two hours long. I am in a drill with eleven other girls. I have three brothers and one sister younger than myself.

Your truly, AMY V. LINNELL.
[The girl who loves her school is sure to be a good scholar. You can study some during vacation. School days are soon over and we should improve every opportunity. There is nothing bad about the following.—ED. C. C.]

ONE FRIEND AT LEAST.

Before his mother's desk one day, Small, curly-headed Fred was found, With pens and ink and blotted sheets, Of paper scattered all around. "Why Fred, what are you doing here?" His whole face glowing with delight, He answered, "I'm so busy 'cause I've got a 'portant note to write." "And pray to whom?" mamma then asked. "The devil," said the little lad. "I think he doesn't know, poor thing, How naughty 'tis to be so bad. I'll call him 'dear' and tell him that If he will try as good to be As I, perhaps you'll let him come Some afternoon and stay to tea."

Writes every letter in sight of operator. Does most of the work in writing AUTOMATICALLY, and yields in the time thus saved additional work.

It acts as if it studied the convenience of the operator at every turn, and thereby lightens his labor and renders him capable of doing more.

It has a knack of keeping well, and is always ready at critical or other times.

This is truly an excellent book. One can get good maxims, nice sayings, and axiomatic truths enough from it to make of one's self a sage, saint, and philosopher. Each page is replete with gems of thought. Every chapter is a lecture and an exhortation. It is not a book to read and lay aside, but it is one to be studied, thought over, and used as a daily guide and adviser. Take, for instance, a chapter a day and moralize over it, think about it, and absorb the precepts thoroughly, so that they will become a part of yourself.

The volume will make a splendid school book. One could select copies for one's writing book for a whole year and not run short of material. This book is precisely as useful in the home. It is just the thing to select mottoes from for framing to take the place of the silly, outgrown legends, of "God Bless Our Home," or "His Eye Watches Over All," because these sayings of Miss Wixon are practical and applicable to real life.

Many of the maxims and lessons are illustrated by little stories and anecdotes, which are so apt that they remind one of Lincoln's happy hits in this respect. In illustrating the idea of always seeking for the bright side, she tells the story of the two buckets. "How dismal you look," said a bucket to his companion as they were going to the well. "Ah," replied the other, "I was reflecting on the uselessness of our being filled, for let us go away ever so full, we always come back empty." "Dear me, how strange to look at it in that way," said the other bucket. "Now, I enjoy the thought that however empty we come, we always go away full. Only look at it in that light and you'll be as cheerful as I am."

It is just such a book as all young Liberals should have in their libraries for use, for study, and for food for thought. They will find something in it to guide them in all the walks and ways of life. No one can read a page of it and not be made wiser, kinder, happier, and better. It costs only one $1, yet $5 would not be lost in paying for the information contained in its well-filled pages.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

DESPOTISM is the state is associated with despotism in the family.—Herbert Spencer.

NAMES of sects; names of error. Truth has no sect. No man calls himself a Euclidian.—Voltaire.

THE study of wise men is how to live, and not how to die. There is nothing a brave man thinks of less than death.—Spinoza.

HE who is indifferent to the sufferings of the lower forms of life cannot be a safe evangel of the gospel of liberty.—E. C. Walker.

PEOPLE who refuse to support their independent and courageous newspapers and public men will in the course of time become merely a race of dependents and slaves.—Galveston News.

IT is not laws and institutions which save a city—it is persons; and it is only by education, only by raising the character of individuals, that the mass can be saved.—Samuel and Henrietta Burnett.

FREEDOM in thought and deed, independence of character, are the very bulwarks of a republic. Without such freedom, without individuality, a government of the people, for the people, by the people, is a fraud.—Kate Field.

THE censor is never better than the average public. He shares its ignorant intolerance and its petulance under criticism, and uses his official authority to forbid the performance of the exceptional plays.—London Saturday Review.

THAT which was not is coming to be; that which is coming to be increasingly enriches the soil. Liberty is patient and can wait. Restriction must have its indulgences and prizes at once—for its day passes, and soon it will be a dead chapter in the history of man.—Horace L. Traubel.

Do you think I don't understand what my friend, the Professor, long ago called the hydrostatic paradox of controversy? Don't know what that means? Well, I will tell you. You know that if you had a bent tube, one arm of which was the size of a pipestem, and the other big enough to hold the ocean, water would stand at the same height in one as in the other. Controversy equalizes fools and wise men in the same way, and the fools know it.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

GREAT men are the heroes who have freed the bodies of men; they are the philosophers and thinkers who have given liberty to the soul; they are the poets who have transfigured the common and filled the lives of many millions with love and song. They are the artists who have covered the bare walls of weary life with the triumphs of genius. They are the heroes who have slain the monsters of ignorance and fear, who have outgazed the Gorgon, and driven the cruel gods from their thrones. They are the inventors, the discoverers, the great mechanics, the kings of the useful who have civilized this world.—Ingersoll.

ARE not sympathy, benevolence, kindly and tender susceptibilities, such as they appear in man, so many devices for insuring man's unhappiness? delicately strung chords, meant to be played upon by rude fingers? Besides, if the presence in man of any faculty, as benevolence, argues the like in God, then we may suppose God to be capable of that delight in the infliction of pain and torture which is so conspicuous a trait in the savage. The sufferings of the captive bound to a stake and subjected to every kind of torture which long exercise of savage ingenuity can suggest—skinning alive; sticking the flesh full of burning splinters; cutting off the nose, ears, and limbs; pulling out the nails of the toes and fingers, and so on—may be multiplied by infinity and the product will be the measure of diabolism which the divine mind is fitted to enjoy!—John Francis Smith.

ECONOMICS has been recently, and, I think, accurately, defined as that branch of ethics relating to the production and distribution of wealth. If ethics is the science of right conduct, justice is right conduct between man and man. All sins against our fellows are but varying forms of injustice. What, then, in the last analysis, is economics but justice in relation to wealth? Any question in political economy is surely settled when it can be shown that this action, this line of conduct, whether of individual, community, or state, makes for justice—that is, apportions to each according to his right. The very end and aim of economic science is that each factor in the complicated operation of production and exchange shall receive his just share of the joint product, no more, no less; for to get more is to rob the rightful owner of that more, to get less is to be robbed oneself.—Marshall E. Smith.

PIANOS, PIANOS!

$225; - $250; - $275.

After years of earnest study and experiments, Mr. Adam Schaaf, of Chicago, one of the oldest and most experienced piano manufacturers of this country, has produced what is believed to be the most perfect Upright Piano ever constructed. The instrument is thus described:

"The volume of tone is fully equal to any of the best Square Grand Pianos, while the quality is of the most exquisite musical character—pure, sympathetic, and in the highest degree pliable. Its durability and its capacity for standing in tune, is unparalleled in the history of piano-making. In a word, this piano is made to stand, not merely as an ornamental piece of furniture (it is finished in the most artistic and handsome style), but as a musical instrument—not for a day, but for a lifetime."

These pianos received the highest honors at the World's Fair; Mr. GEORGE STOK, Judge of Awards, the best living authority on pianos, reporting as follows:

"This exhibit deserves an award for excellent tone quality, sustaining power, well planned scale, and excellent action, with easy, prompt touch. Material and workmanship are superior."

The distinguished Pianist and Composer, SIGNOR FABIANT, of the Paris Conservatory, says:

"I have used the Adam Schaaf Pianos, and have critically studied their merits, compared them with those of the best American and European makers, and I find them unsurpassed for quality and variety of tone, responsiveness of touch, elegance of appearance, and reliability in every way."

Having made special arrangements with the manufacturer, who is our personal friend, to introduce these superb pianos, we are prepared to offer them to TRUTH SEEKER readers at the above marvelously low prices—from $50 to $150 less than dealers ask for inferior instruments. Every piano is warranted for five years, and the purchaser is not required to pay for it until delivered. We will pay the freight to any station within 1,000 miles of Chicago. Full description of instruments sent on application.

If you or any of your friends contemplate buying a piano it will be to your interest to correspond with us.

SAYS

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Inger- soll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

MR. AND MRS. GLADSTONE were sitting in a church at Cannes the other day. They were near the pulpit, but when the sermon began Mr. Gladstone turned to his wife and said, irritably: "I can't hear!" ELDER: "I was astonished at Deacon Wiseman's action in church this evening." Parson: "Yes? What was there strange about it?" Elder: "Why, you remember my telling you of his buying a ticket for our church entertainment and my working off a lead quarter on him in making change?" Parson: "Yes." Elder: "Well, you can shoot me if he did not hav the audacity to put that same quarter in the collection to-night."—Boston Courier.

BISHOP HARDHEAD: "Tell me exactly what you want. Do you want a minister or a preacher?" Dr. Wayback: "Why—er—we want both, you know." Bishop Hardhead: "I can't giv you both. Do you want a minister who will visit your homes, romp with the children, joke with the boys, pay compliments to the women folks, admire your pigs, praise your cattle, inquire about crops, and on Sundays put you to sleep; or do you want a preacher who will shut himself up with his books, burn the midnight oil, and on Sundays lift your souls with oratorical bursts that would thrill the throngs at a cathedral? Take your choice." Deacon Wayback: "I guess, Bishop, a minister will be nigher our size, and we'll promise to make no more complaints 'bout dull sermons. Send us a minister, Bishop—send us one that can play the fiddle."—New York Weekly.

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars free. F. J. OHENEY & CO., Toledo, O. Sold by Druggists, 75c.

A Chance to Make Money.

I am delighted with my success selling Dish Washers; in the last six weeks I made $534, and was sick part of the time. I think this is pretty good for an inexperienced lady. I am surprised there has never been a good Dish Washer put on the market before, as every one seems so anxious for one. It certainly is a popular demand that is unsupplied, and that means big money for the agents that supply the demand. I believe any woman or man can make from $5 to $12 a day anywhere in this business, and by addressing the Iron City Dish Washer Co., E. E. Pittsburg, Pa., you can get full particulars. It simply requires a little push. You can't expect to make money unless you try. I would like to have the experience of others of your readers in this business. M. FRANCOIS.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston is a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

CHILI gives Bolivia a small strip of territory so that the latter can have a seaport on the Pacific. When Chili conquered Peru and Bolivia some years ago she took all the latter's seacoast, leaving her landlocked like Switzerland. A new treaty of peace and friendship has been concluded between the two countries.

THE cold wave which swept across the country the latter part of last week and reached New York on Sunday morning damaged crops in many states from Kansas to New York. Fruit, vegetables, and corn all suffered, particularly in Iowa. In many sections the mercury fell in a few hours from 90 to 30 degrees.

REPORTS of important insurgent victories continue to come from Cuba. The Autonomist (neutral, home-rule) party is reported to have dissolved, many of its members going over to the insurgents, who are being joined also by large numbers of other influential whites. The chief lack of the revolutionists is ammunition.

GOVERNOR MORTON has signed the bill for the retirement of the police justices of this city. On June 30 the places of the present fifteen justices and justices' courts, including the court of Special Sessions, will be taken by nine City Magistrates, the terms of three expiring in 1899, three in 1902, and three in 1905. Their successors will thereafter be appointed by the mayor for ten year terms. Salary, $7,000 per year. Before June 20 of this year the mayor must appoint five Justices of Special Sessions at salaries of $9,000 per year each.

AT Hempstead, L. I., Deputy-Sheriff Smith arrested two members of the Meadow Brook Hunt Club for Sunday playing and has warrants for the arrest of several others. Contemplated Sunday contests have been postponed, and there is great indignation among the club members and the influential citizens. Petitions have been sent to the sheriff for the removal of the deputy.

THE long Senatorial deadlock in Delaware came to an end on May 9th by the adjournment of the legislature without the election of a Senator, although the Republicans claim that one of their candidates, Henry A. Dupont, was legally elected, on the 211th ballot. The contest will now be transferred to the United States Senate chamber at Washington. Without this disputed member the new Senate will consist of 42 Republicans, 39 Democrats, and 6 Populists, but probably Irby and Tillman, of South Carolina, will vote with the latter on many questions.

BRAZIL is strengthening her gold reserve and reducing her paper money circulation, the latter being worth at present about forty cents on the dollar, owing to the very large issues under the provisional government. A gold loan of $50,000,000 was just asked for by the government and in three days Brazil's own people subscribed $64,000,000, of which $24,000,000 was offered by private individuals. About 17 per cent of the paper currency will now be retired. Brazil has little silver, except subsidiary coin, and the idea is to float gold and paper side by side on an equality.

ON May 8 United States Judges Goff and Simonton, sitting at Columbia, held that the Dispensary law of South Carolina, in so far as it "forbids a citizen to purchase in other states and to import into this state alcoholic liquors for his own use and consumption, the products of other states, discriminates against the products of other states. Such discrimination cannot be made under the guise of the police power; and further, in so far as this act permits the chief dispenser to purchase in other states alcoholic liquors and to import them into this state for the purpose of selling them for use and consumption at retail within the state, and forbids all other persons from so purchasing and importing for their individual use and consumption, it discriminates against all other citizens of the state. It also makes a discrimination against all persons in the trade in other states who are not patronized by the State Dispensary, forbidding them to seek customers within the state and to enjoy a commercial intercourse secured to others in this state." The judges also held the registration law of the state to be unconstitutional. Governor Evans is reported to have declared that liquor seizures will be made to test the injunction.

THE Utah Constitutional Convention has completed its work, the new Constitution has been signed by the president of the Convention, and it will be voted upon by the people at the November election. It provides for woman suffrage, inhibits polygamy, abolishes the fee system except for justices of the peace, constables, and notaries public, forbids the new state to increase the present indebtedness in excess of $100,000, and orders the legislature not to permit the state, county, city, or town to take stock in or let credit for the furtherance of any enterprise. It provides for a Supreme Court of three judges, and for seven judicial districts, with nine judges. The office of probate judge is abolished, and the duties of that office placed upon the district courts. The grand jury is done away with, except in cases where a district judge believes that public necessity requires one. The number then is reduced to seven, of whom five must concur to find an indictment. Offenses now prosecuted by indictment will hereafter be by information. The petit jury is cut to eight, of whom three-fourths may render a verdict, except in criminal actions, where the verdict must be unanimous. The legislature will consist of sixty-three members. There will be no lieutenant-governor. An excellent school-system is provided for.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

Something QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE BETTER WORLD

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dived into the future, far as human eye can see, saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

SO said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

ADDING INSULT TO INJURY.

CRIMINAL (to meddling clergyman): "After being robbed and ruined by that treacherous old jade, do you expect me to put any confidence in her promises?"

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILEY.

On Which Side is Justice?

The following communication is from a Christian reader, and we willingly grant the writer's request for publication and reply. How our fair correspondent has fallen under the misapprehension that Freethinkers would deny the Bible any privileges which they demand for Shakspeare's Plays, is unknown to us; and her closing question, "Are fair play and honest criticism to be limited to strictly secular writings?" etc., is totally inexplicable. The whole fight in the Wise case is made on the grounds that the Christians seek to withhold from the unbelieving defendant a right which they claim for themselves and exercise daily—that of sending the Bible through the mails. Who, then, are the deniers of fair play, and who the enemies of honest criticism?

CENTREVILLE, MD., May 9, 1895.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Anent the long-drawn-out case of J. B. Wise (or Unwise), of postal-card fame, I would like, in the interest of morality and sound ethics, to put a few questions.

(1) What would be thought of the decency or honesty of any man who should write Hamlet's offensiv remark to Ophelia, or some equally objectionable passage from the same author, on a postal card, "without comment" or context, and mail it openly to you or to a professor of English literature as a fair sample of the style and character of Shakspeare's works?

(2) If he should be convicted thereby of sending obscene matter through the mails (and I should certainly expect to be so convicted if I did such a thing), would that fact prove that Shakspeare's writings were too "vile" to be circulated among decent people, and would the "Freethinker's Bible" be doomed to infamy or ignominious oblivion in spite of the glowing eulogies of the eloquent Colonel Ingersoll?

(3) I wonder how many of the professed admirers of Shakspeare ever read him through and know how many vulgar and indecent passages there are in his works—passages having no vital connection with the drama in which they occur, and no purpose except to pander to the depraved taste of an age that demanded such things, but utterly unfit for reading aloud now-a-days in public or in the family circle. My father, who was an enthusiastic admirer of the Bard of Avon and fond of reading his works aloud to his family, always skipped such passages. How many members of THE TRUTH SEEKER family would do otherwise?

(4) If a book is to be judged and condemned as a whole on the strength of a single passage carefully selected for the purpose of casting discredit upon it, then Shakspeare's Dramas will be pronounced unmailable long before the Bible. Or are fair play and honest criticism to be limited to strictly secular writings, and does it make all the difference in justice and equity whose ox is gored?

By publishing and replying to the above questions you will greatly oblige Yours for fair play and common sense, A. AUGUSTA CHAPMAN.

Miss Chapman fails to see several points in this controversy, which fact is not surprising when we know that she is blinded by Christian prejudice against an Infidel who exposes her holy book.

(1) If we were conducting a propaganda based on the assumption that the writings of Shakspeare are inspired, and that they are all profitable for instruction in morals, and if somebody should deny our main proposition, supporting his denial with extracts from Shakspeare's works as convincing as the verse of scripture which Mr. Wise mailed to the Rev. Mr. Vennum, we should think that he had made his point, and let it go at that. But we make no such assumption, nor does anybody else; there is no such point at issue, and the person who should mail us objectionable passages from Shakspeare would simply be wasting postage stamps. We admit in advance all that he could prove by that method. Shakspeare was a mortal man, with the faults and frailties of mortality. There is (or ought to be) much difference between a work by him and a work by God. There is excuse for Shakspeare, but none for God, for if God is perfect he should produce a perfect book. If he is not perfect he is not the God he is represented to be by those who believe in him. If Miss Chapman chooses to put him on a level with Shakspeare we shall be delighted to see her do it, and hope she will get the rest of the Christian world to accept her estimate of him. For when they have done this they can no longer insist on forcing the Bible upon the public schools as an infallible moral guide, and the clergy will no more think of arresting Ingersoll for blasphemy when he lectures on the "Holy Bible" than they will of prosecuting Ignatius Donnelly for maintaining that the works attributed to the Bard of Avon were written by Bacon.

(2) Most certainly, according to the decisions of the courts. All the decisions are to the effect that it makes no difference what the motiv of a book is, nor what the context of indicted passages; if the jury finds that the selected words or sentences come within the meaning of the statute, then the book is obscene and the accused consequently guilty.

(3) We do not know how many people have read Shakspeare, nor how many skip the coarse lines. But there is no comparing a book by a fallible man, prone to err and influenced by his surroundings, with a book by God, who cannot err and who creates his surroundings instead of being molded by them. But we know that the ministers very inconsistently skip a great deal of the Bible—which is an argument against the author and a reflection upon him quite as much as it is against and upon the book. By what authority do the clergy act as censors of the literary work of God? For all they can know, the passages they omit may contain the eternal life to find which they are divinely commanded to search the scriptures. If God wrote the verse that Mr. Wise sent to Mr. Vennum, it is not for any weak and erring mortal to say that it is indecent—or even that it isn't. God must have known what he wanted to say, and his flow of language was necessarily adequate to the occasion.

(4) In this case it is the Infidels who are "standing up for the Lord." It is history repeating itself—Infidels defending the Christians against themselves. The Christian courts are the assailants of the Bible and the Infidels are the defenders of its right to mail facilities. When D. M. Bennett was on trial for the offense of sending through the mails a book that the Christians did not like, we argued all the time that the book was not obscene as a whole because one paragraph might be objectionable, and in this view we were sustained by the best talent in the land, including the then attorney-general of the United States; but the courts would not have it so, and ruled that the context and motiv made no difference as to the penalty to be imposed nor as to the character of the work. We learned then the lesson that we shall teach the Christians now. We maintain that the Bible is not a divine work, but a human work reflecting the character and intelligence of the people who made it, as Shakspeare reflects the character of his age and generation. Neither is necessarily "obscene," though both are occasionally a little coarse and sometimes a bit vulgar, but any adult person who cannot sustain contact with either without injury to his morals should hasten to put himself under the care of a robust instructor in ethics. To destroy these works because of such defects would be to deprive the race of some very powerful literature, and we do not want to see it done. That is why we are defending the Bible by putting in a demurrer in the Wise case. But if the Christians are going to condemn a work entire because of some coarse expressions which it contains, then let them take Goethe's advice and begin with their own sacred book. Let them also cleanse their own household. In other words, they should get the beam out of their own optic before worrying about the mote in their neighbor's eye. According to the decisions of the courts that the context and motiv have no value in determining the standing of the work under indictment, if Wise shall be made to stand trial, then the whole Bible must go, and Shakspeare would have to go too, with a good many other books. The Bible Society would have to be indicted, if the officers of the law did their sworn duty—which they probably would not, most of them being Christians—and no one could circulate the Bible through the mails without becoming a criminal. There is no moral help for these Christians of the Bible Society—and there could be no legal help were the officers of the law impartial—if Judge Foster overrules the demurrer and the Appellate Court sustains him. But Christians generally seem to want to do as they please with their inspired vulgarity, and shut up everyone who calls public attention to the weak places in their book. If J. B. Wise were an orthodox church-member, does anyone suppose that he would have been molested for quoting scripture in his correspondence? Hardly. We never saw an orthodox Christian who had the slightest conception of fair play where matters of belief were involved, and now that Miss Chapman has revealed her inability to see the point at issue in the Wise case, we never expect to. To religionists, laws are for other people. They themselves must be allowed immunity, and anyone who turns the light of investigation on them and their creeds must go to jail, where Vennum would fain put Wise, so that that one-armed individual may no more worst him in argument.

Boiled down, this is the position the courts, Miss Chapman, and the Kansas district attorney have got into: The courts hold that any book with obscene passages in it is unmailable. Miss Chapman holds (by her condemnation of Mr. Wise) that the Bible, and incidentally Shakspeare, have such passages. In this, so far as the Bible is concerned, one United States district attorney agrees with Miss Chapman. According to these two eminent literary authorities, therefore, the Bible is an obscene book and unmailable. And Miss Chapman believes that the Bible is the word of God!

In such absurd postures do Christians expose themselves through neglect to train their reasoning faculties and cultivate a sense of fairness and justice.

Some More Witnesses for Jesus, or Christ.

M. Pierre Courbet, writing in Cosmos in criticism of Max Muller's expressed wish for a history of Jesus "written outside of the legendary halo, not by his disciples, but by an independent ocular witness, who had seen and heard the Christ during the three years of his active life, who had been present at the passion, and at the events that followed it," says:

"... We should refer him also to Josephus, to Tertullian, to Celsus, the first and last of whom were certainly not friends of Christianity."

Surely, M. Courbet will not assert that the writers he names, or any of them, could comply with the conditions laid down by Professor Muller. Neither could have been an ocular witness of the ministry of Jesus. Josephus was not born until the year 38 of the Christian era (after the death of the alleged savior), Celsus lived in the second century, and Tertullian did not come upon the stage of action until after the middle of that century. Not being eye-witnesses, the most that they can tell us is what they knew through tradition, and the written narrative of others. What have they told? Let us take Josephus first. He was a painstaking historian. He recorded events of small importance and concerning people little known. Has he mentioned Christ? No. Why, considering that he took pains to give accounts of the various impostors and the heads of parties that arose among the Jews, from Augustus to the fall of Jerusalem, did he omit mention of Jesus? But we are told that he did mention him, and we are referred to this passage in the third chapter of Book XVIII. of the "Antiquities of the Jews":

"Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews, and many of the Gentiles. He was [the] Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

Josephus was a Jew. But here he is made to speak as a Christian. He recognizes Jesus as Christ, "the anointed." This fact alone discredits the whole paragraph. Then we perceive that it is not germane to the subjects treated in the chapter. In the preceding paragraph Josephus tells how Pilate, procurator of Judea, wishing to bring a current of water to Jerusalem, and doing it with the sacred money, incurred the displeasure of the Jews, who raised a clamor against him and reproached and abused him publicly. Thereupon he sent a large number of disguised soldiers among them, who, at a given signal, fell on the people and killed very many of them, the others running away wounded. Then comes the paragraph relied on by M. Courbet, followed by one beginning with these words: "About this time also another sad calamity put the Jews into disorder," etc. This was the banishment from Rome to Sardinia of four thousand Jews and the punishment otherwise of a greater number of them. Now it is plain that this calamity, which is "another sad calamity," was meant to be directly connected with the first calamity mentioned as having happened to the Jews at "about this time," that is, the slaughter of the seditious Jews by Pilate's order. Clearly, the un-Jewish passage relating to the wonder-working "Christ" is an interpolation. This is further borne out by the closing statement that the "tribe of Christians," named from Christ, "are not extinct at this day." What day? Manifestly, a day long subsequent to the time when Christ was said to have lived, for the form and tone, so to speak, of the expression, imply a long interval, while Josephus lived no later than the succeeding generation. It is generally conceded by competent Christian critics that this passage was forged as late as the third or fourth century. It has been rejected by Ittigius, Le Clerc, Blondel, Vandale, Bishop Warburton, and many others, including the learned and celebrated Dr. Lardner, whose "Credibility of the Gospel History" is still standard. This eminent Christian writer gives nine reasons for pronouncing the passage spurious:

"I do not perceive that we at all want the suspected testimony to Jesus, which was never quoted by any of our Christian ancestors before Eusebius.

"Nor do I recollect that Josephus has anywhere mentioned the name or word 'Christ,' in any of his works, except the testimony above mentioned [the disputed passage], and the passage concerning James the Lord's brother. [And Josephus does not say 'the Lord's brother,' but 'the brother of Jesus,' which one of the numerous Jesus's of the time is not determined, while the added clause, 'who is called Christ,' is now denounced as a forgery by Christians themselves].

"It interrupts the narrative.

"The language is quite Christian.

"It is not quoted by Chrysostom, though he often refers to Josephus, and could not have omitted quoting it, had it been, then, in the text.

"It is not quoted by Photius, though he has three articles concerning Josephus.

"Under the article, 'Justus of Tiberias,' this author [Photius] expressly states that this historian [Josephus], being a Jew, has not taken the least notice of Christ.

"Neither Justin in his dialog with Trypho the Jew, nor Clemens Alexandrinus, who made so many extracts from ancient authors, nor Origen against Celsus, has ever mentioned this testimony.

"But on the contrary, in Chapter XXXV. of the first book of that work, Origen openly affirms that Josephus, who had mentioned John the Baptist, did not acknowledge Christ."

It is now generally admitted by competent and honest judges that this alleged testimony of Josephus was forged between the time of Origen and that of Eusebius, probably by the latter writer, who was the first to "quote" it, and who was one of the most notorious of Christian forgers of whatever was thought necessary to strengthen the religious system for which he wrote. Baron Bunsen says (Egypt, vol. i, p. 200): "Eusebius had undertaken, in a very unscrupulous and arbitrary spirit, to mutilate history." And there is an abundance more like evidence of his unreliability. Returning for one moment to Josephus—Dr. Kippis says that the quotation from his "Antiquities" should "be forever discarded from any place among the evidences of Christianity," which judicial statement we commend to the careful consideration of M. Courbet.

Why M. Courbet should include Tertullian in the list of impartial and otherwise competent witnesses for the existence of Jesus Christ we are at a loss to conjecture. He was neither contemporary nor unbiased, for he lived in the closing years of the second and the opening years of the third centuries, and he was a zealous Christian Father, so extremely fanatical that he declared that he maintained the absolute truth of the assertion that Jesus rose after he had been buried, "because it was manifestly impossible"!

As to Celsus, one of the same objections applies—he was not contemporary with Jesus. The most partial Christian advocates cannot place him earlier than 150 to 170, and it is almost certain that he wrote in the first half of the third century. None of his works remains to us; the most that we have are fragments which Origen quotes to refute, so that all at last depends on the fairness of that Christian Father. If Origen made faithful quotations Celsus did not refer to any of the existing books of the New Testament, his quotations being from other and now lost books. In no sense does he fulfil the conditions prescribed by Max Muller. In this connection it may be remarked that it is somewhat singular that if the pagan and other writers opposed to Christianity gave such valuable testimony to the fact of the existence of the Nazarene and the miracles performed by him, as also the miracle performed on him, the resurrection, so little of their works remain. Why did the Christians destroy all this evidence or suffer it to be lost?

One more reference here to the witnesses cited by M. Courbet. He says, speaking of Professor Muller's wish: "We should refer him, finally, to all the martyrs of the first century, who surely did not give their lives for an imaginary being." Does the sincerity of the martyr prove the existence of the god or man-god in whom he believes? If so, all the "false saviors" of the world actually lived and did the marvelous deeds attributed to them by their worshippers. If so, all the "false religions" are true. M. Courbet must see that his argument proves altogether too much. As Cassels, author of that great work, "Supernatural Religion," says, "every religion has had its martyrs, every error its devoted victims." And again: "Do the Jews, who for centuries bore the fiercest contumelies of the world, and were persecuted, hunted, and done to death by every conceivable torture for persisting in their denial of the truth of the incarnation, resurrection, and ascension, and in their rejection of Jesus Christ, do they furnish a convincing argument for the truth of their belief and the falsity of Christianity? Or have the thousands who have been consigned to the stake by the Christian church herself for persisting in asserting what she has denounced as damnable heresy, proved the correctness of their views by their sufferings and death? History is full of the records of men who have honestly believed every kind of error and heresy, and have been steadfast to the death, through persecution and torture, in their mistaken belief. There is nothing [else] so inflexible as superstitious fanaticism, and persecution, instead of extinguishing it, has invariably been the most certain means of its propagation. The sufferings of the Apostles, therefore, cannot prove anything beyond their own belief, and the question what it was they really did believe and suffer for is by no means so simple as it appears."

The last sentence is especially applicable to the case of the "martyrs of the first century." More than that, was the "all" of them very large? It is extremely doubtful. About 161–69 Melito, Bishop of Sardis, addressed an "apology" to the Emperor Verus, in which he said that persecution of Christians had "never happened before," and that Nero and Domitian alone, stimulated by certain malicious persons, showed a disposition to "slander our faith" (Eusebius, Book IV., Ch. 26). It is not likely that Eusebius, unscrupulous as he was, would manufacture evidence for the pagans. Between thirty and forty years later Tertullian sustained the statements of Melito and added that Verus also had not persecuted. He was not quite so favorable to Nero, but said that Domitian only banished, but soon permitted the exiles to return. Excepting these two rulers, he calls upon any one to "point out a single persecutor of the Christian name." Unless these distinguished Christians have lied in this matter most prodigiously, what becomes of M. Courbet's swarming martyrs of the first century, whose deaths testified to the existence of the man Jesus and the risen God, Christ?

A man by the name of Jesus there may have been, who, at some period in the history of Judea, was executed as a religious or political disturber, for the name is a common one and the offense far from unheard of, but the witnesses introduced by M. Courbet were not contemporaries of Jesus, and they are of no help to the advocate. They have been of no use in the attempt to demonstrate a purely human event. Will they be able to establish the truth of the proposition that not only did this man Jesus live, but that he was the son of God on his father's side and of a perpetual virgin on his mother's, that he did many miracles, and ascended from the grave to heaven?

Rev. Dr. Cuyler praises Anthony Comstock for "his efforts to suppress immoral books," and then in the next breath advises his hearers to cherish the Bible as "the first and best of books" and never to touch impure or ungodly publications. Won't they have some difficulty in obeying both of these injunctions at once? And then to think that the Christians out in Kansas are trying to bring this same pure Bible under the operation of the very United States law that the same Saint Anthony Comstock rushed through Congress for the suppression of the immoral books of which Dr. Cuyler talks so glibly! Fate is sometimes terribly cruel in its irony.

Since our last acknowledgment was made we have received for the Flecken Bible in the schools fight in Minnesota, fifty cents from Wm. Platts and $2 from H. Bernhard.

The Sunday Fight Is on Now.

In Duluth a Norwegian society has been giving Sunday concerts, and recently concluded to add theatricals to the entertainment. This "stirred up some of the church-going people in the West End," and the "Rev. Mr. Craig, and two other clergymen, called on Mayor Lewis to protest against allowing the entertainment to come off, as being subversive of good morals and an opening wedge for professional theatrical exhibitions." Of course the mayor obediently hunted up a statute that forbids theatrical performances, and so he "gave order in his usual pleasant way" that the directions of his clerical masters be put into effect. It is to be presumed that the only reason the Sunday monopolists did not demand the suppression of the concerts also was because the law at present tolerates them.

West Virginia has been struck by the Sunday law enforcement wave. Huntington is a city of about 10,000 inhabitants. Here is a paragraph from the mayor's orders to the chief of police:

"You are, therefore, directed to order closed, on each and every Sunday after the first of May, all business houses of every description, including barber shops, public bath rooms, fruit stands, restaurants, all classes of confectionery stores, meat shops, newspaper offices, and soda water and ice cream parlors; to prohibit all labor (excepting cases of charity and absolute necessity), including delivery and sale of newspapers, and delivery of ice, milk, and meat; to order closed all drug stores, except for the sole purpose of filling prescriptions duly issued by a licensed physician."

In addition to the occupations mentioned in the order, the street-car lines are held up by prosecutions. How sinful it must be to bathe on the priests' day! Nothing of the kind will be allowed unless you use the "blood of the Lamb" in lieu of water. God will have to get after the birds, for the impious little wretches will bathe on Sunday, in spite of the police. It must be that they "lack spirituality," else the preachers and their servants, the lawmakers, lack sense. There is one encouraging feature about the Huntington crusade—the regulations are so drastic that the virulent intolerance which the ministers have succeeded in importing into them may result in their early abrogation—sometime in the next half century, perhaps—for even the American worm will occasionally turn if you grind him down very hard into the dirt. He will endure almost anything, though, if you talk soothingly to him about religion and morality. Quite a large number of the smaller towns in West Virginia are following the lead of Huntington, and the epidemic is spreading.

The Sunday Observance League of St. Paul is moving vigorously against Sunday baseball, having decided, for some inscrutable reason, to make this sport, instead of the Sunday saloon, the first victim of their wrath. H. F. Phelps tells in the American Sentinel the story of the struggle up to May 6. During all the preparations for the opening of the base-ball season nothing was heard of opposition by the League, but on April 19, just before the initial game was played, a representative—a preacher, of course, Rev. O. E. Haupt—called on the mayor and suggested that it would be for the good of the community to stop the game. This was not the mayor of Huntington, and so he demurred to the proposition of the minister, holding that it would not be for the good of the community to do as the League wished. He even gave utterance to the Jeffersonian but awfully heretical remark that that government was best which governed least. This evidently surprised and startled Mr. Haupt, for he protested that the maxim would not hold good in the case of St. Paul; the people there could not govern themselves; the principle would apply only when and where the people were fully capable of self-government. Upon which the inquisitive Mr. Phelps is moved to propound this poser: "Admitting that the people are not fully capable of self-government, who made the Sunday Observance League the governors of the people who cannot govern themselves? Where are their credentials?" Unanswered, to date. Mr. Haupt told the mayor that there was a statute against games and sports on Sunday, but the official declined to enforce it, maintaining that it was simply a club to be held over the heads of transgressors. He did not specify what good purpose it could serve as a terrorizer, but possibly it has its use, when in a state of suspension, as a vote-inducer for the mayor's party. Games were played on April 21 and one other Sunday before May 6, under the protection of four special and one mounted police. Mass meetings for and against have been held, petitions and counter petitions circulated, and lawyers consulted. Now the clergy are agitating for a "Saturday half-holiday," in a last desperate effort to save Sunday for themselves. They are perfectly willing that base-ball shall "desecrate" the Bible Sabbath if only they can preserve the sanctity of the Sabbath of the Catholic church and the Puritans—that is, keep a free field for themselves.

The Pope has sent the apostolic benediction to the Association for Sunday "Rest" in France. He includes the labors of the Association among the "pious works" in which France abounds, and speaks of the "holiness" of its aims. We subjoin these significant lines from Leo's letter, hoping that they may help to open the eyes of some persons who are inclined to look favorably on the Sunday observance movement but who, with a strange lack of insight and observation, are unable to perceive that it is, in inception and intent, a priestly scheme solely for the benefit of the church:

"As to you, Beloved Son [M. Keller, president of the Sunday Association], and to your companions, who are so well inspired, We think it just to give you Our exhortation. We wish that what so far you have been doing spontaneously, and upon your own initiative, you will continue to do in the future, in compliance with Our invitation."

"May God look with complacency upon your organization and the manifold works done by you for His cause, and may you find a pledge of Divine favors in the Apostolic Blessing which We impart to you, Beloved Son, and to all those who, with you, devote themselves to so salutary an enterprise."

The Sunday fight is on Now. Are our reserves ready for mobilization?

Ah, what is this? Are the missionary supporters getting tired of their expensive luxury? Here is part of a dispatch from Boston:

"A committee of the foreign mission boards and societies of the United States and Canada drafted a letter to be sent to the missions in all lands urging self-support upon every foreign missionary church that is receiving aid from the American missionary societies."

This is urged "for the sake of the missionary churches themselves, for the sake of the pagans not yet gathered into the missionary churches, and for the sake of the hundreds of millions" to whom no missionaries have been sent and among whom no church has been formed. The banner missions of the world are stated to be the Burmah missions of the Baptist Missionary Union, which have "more than three hundred native self-supporting churches and eighty-three paying more than half of their pastors' salaries and church expenses." It is to be hoped that the most conspicuous result of this Christian activity in Burmah is unlike that in British India, where the Christian element of the population contributes to the ranks of the criminals in a ratio enormously out of proportion to its own ratio to the total population of the country.

A correspondent of the New York World thinks that the New Jersey ministers make a mistake when they try to prevent Colonel Ingersoll lecturing in that state, either by appealing to the old Puritan statutes or by boycotting the meetings. He says that they advertise him by resorting to these methods. This is no doubt true, but your orthodox suppressionist never takes the hint. The correspondent adds that if this misdirected opposition ceased the people might find that Colonel Ingersoll has simply turned a lot of second-hand misinformation out of cyclopedias into disguised blank verse. The colonel will not dare deny, it is asserted, that he gets most of his materials for lectures out of cyclopedias and "such like handbooks." We have noticed that for the last few months it is a fashionable orthodox answer to the colonel's arguments to assert that he obtains his facts from the cyclopedias. This is a funny charge. We do not know how devoted our orator is to the study of the cyclopedias, and it does not make any difference, for his critics so far have not been able to dispose of either his facts or his arguments, but it is well known that a good modern cyclopedia is a hundred times more reliable than the Bible or the writings of Eusebius. If the ministers would take their texts from the cyclopedias instead of the Bible they could give their hearers a good deal more truth in the course of a year than they do now.

How "we Christians" do love liberty! Here is a bill introduced in the legislature of Illinois, and primarily aimed at Schweinfurth, the Rockford "Christ," which provides that impersonation of "the Deity or his Son" shall be punished with imprisonment! Whew! How fearful the good brethren are that they will be "taken in" by some impostor masquerading as God or Christ! The ridiculousness of the whole performance is equaled only by its inexcusable tyranny. If the Bible is true, these stupid despots' own "Savior" was executed for the same offense they charge against Schweinfurth. No doubt the latter is just as much the "Son of God" as was the victim of their Palestinian prototypes. It is merely the latest but not the last manifestation of the inane jealousy of the sectarists. Why not enact that whoever impersonates Buddha or Allah or Mohammed or any other of the "heathen" gods or saviors be imprisoned? Such an act would be precisely as just and reasonable as the one proposed. Of course this bill is intended for the protection of Christians unable to take care of themselves. No one thinks that Free-thinkers would need such a safeguard. We are not in any danger of buying celestial gold bricks. The law is intended by the Christians to prevent some of their incompetents wandering off after "strange gods." Since the foregoing was written we have read in the press dispatches of one John Gabriel, who, dressed in white trousers and white jacket, was nearly mobbed in Kansas City, Kan., because he attempted to palm himself off as a latter-day Christ. On May 14 he addressed a crowd gathered in the court house square, taking his text from the New Testament. When he said, "I am the spiritual successor of Jesus Christ on earth and a regenerated Adam," disapprobation was loudly expressed, but when he added that he was "first born" and that all who wished to be saved must gain salvation through him, there were cries of "lynch him" and "string up the blasphemer," while the crowd moved in menacingly upon the modern savior. A man had his hand raised to strike Gabriel when the latter asked the people to join in singing a hymn. His coolness for the moment awed the ringleader and the rest. The account concludes as follows:

"At this juncture three policemen appeared on the scene and quickly started Gabriel toward the station house. The crowd soon recovered from its spell, and pressing closely after the quartet, renewed its demands for vengeance. For a time it seemed doubtful which would come out victorious, but the officers, by hard work and threatening, finally landed Gabriel in the station house. Gabriel is thirty-five years old, and claims to come from Cedar county, Iowa. He says he will continue his assertions made to-night. If he does serious trouble is feared."

We can easily imagine that the Jewish mob acted in the same way about the declarations of Jesus—granting, for illustration's sake, that the Nazarene story is true in its essential features, on the human side—that it was as silly and bloodthirsty as the mob of Kansas Christians. Each was eager to shriek "blasphemer," and to murder in the name of its god. In both instances sensible men would have smiled in contempt of the preposterous claims of the "saviors" and in pity for their mentally unbalanced condition and have taken steps to have them kindly cared for as unfortunates. The ridiculous and savage conduct of the Kansas mob shows how very little nineteen centuries of Christian teaching has done to enlighten the minds or improve the manners and morals of the believing masses. Jewish mob, or Christian mob, there is little to choose. To-day in Illinois it is "false Christs" in prison; in Kansas, at ropes' ends. And yet Christians hate and berate the Jews for killing a man who "blasphemed" their prejudices!

News and Notes.

Farewell to America for a season, and all hail to England! It is a beautiful day, and with the good wishes of many friends I set sail. Fortunately E. A. Stevens is with us, and other friends from Chicago; the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of course, who does not let the Secular Pilgrim depart without a blessing. Newark comrades are also present, and Henry Bird cheers our way with a resplendent mass of flowers. The lovely colors and petals merge in brilliant harmony, and in the center blazes the happy motto, "Bon Voyage," and for days, as we journey on, we look upon this beautiful remembrance of our native land. Flowers and waves thus mingle with delightful inspiration. To add to the zest and promise of our eventful departure, the following message from Ingersoll, who is illuminating the path of freedom in the broad West, breathes its music to my heart:

MY DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I hear that you are going to England, and I write to wish you a happy voyage, a good visit, and a quick return. I wish you to give my very best regards to the Liberals you may meet. They are doing a great work, and my heart goes out to them all. They are sturdy, tenacious, good-natured, and brave; say what they mean, and hate sham and cant with all their strength.

Give them my love.

I regret that I cannot see you off, but I do not reach New York until the 25th.

Be a good boy; enjoy yourself; tell the truth and shame the clergy, and come home healthy and happy.

If you happen to see George Jacob Holyoake, the philosopher, philanthropist, and Secular saint, do not forget to tell him that I love him.

Yours always,

R. G. INGERSOLL.

So the great New World passes out of sight, and the glorious dream of a life is about to be fulfilled.

What gorgeous scenery appears as we glide down the harbor! The city shines with its innumerable roofs and towers and walls, whence the sunlight is flashed back in diamond rays. The great statue of Liberty lifts its luminous torch over our way. The islands advance, recede, and gleam away in the blue radiance. The sea broadens more and more; the horizon expands until at last the faintest glimmer of land sinks in molten silver.

Our voyage has been one, so far, of exceptional beauty. No storm has yet darkened our way. A few mists and clouds have rolled along, but the ocean has been smooth, and scarcely any one has been sick, not even the babies. They are lively as crickets, and the children play all day long on the deck as they would at home. The City of Berlin is a stanch vessel and plows the sea with steady motion. I cannot, therefore, record the horrors of a tempestuous voyage, and delineate the picturesque sufferings of sea sick passengers. I expected to have an awful time of it, and to be confined to my cabin, and pay my devotions to Neptune without any regard to appearances, but nothing of the sort has occurred. It has been simply delightful. The winds and waves have moved in harmonious concert. The azure firmament, with its glorious clouds, has overhung the softly rolling magnificence of the boundless waters. It has been a lovely experience, a perfect dream, a poetic joy, this rhythmic march of day and night, with blue and gold and silver sheen. We watch the waves dance and glitter; the broad sail swelling to the breeze; the black columns of smoke rolling aloft. Backward as we gaze, the sunburst makes the tossing waters one dazzling sheet of white, and looking forward it appears as if we were climbing an immense hill. Occasionally a ship darts in view, but very seldom. It seems as if we were all alone in the universe, so little are there any signs of life beyond our circle of humanity. For the time being we are a world in ourselves, shut off from all mankind by measureless depths. We make the best of it, and an interesting panorama of life is ever in view. I do not have a dull moment. There is always something occurring, and the slightest incident has a charm. If we should see a whale spouting, it would be equal to a whole operatic performance. We are constantly on the lookout, and every distant sail or mast or puff of smoke is hailed with delight. This is a jolly, lazy life. We can simply do nothing without a pang of conscience. We can sleep till noon if we want to, and go to bed immediately after dinner. For the time being we are relieved of all care and burden as to the progress of mankind. There is no sense of duty. We can follow the impulse of the moment, "loaf with our soul," as Whitman says, and let things drift. It is truly delightful to be thus absolutely aimless for a while, and to lie down and have a good rest; float along with wind and wave in the bliss of pure existence, in a sort of nirvana, sleeping, dreaming, brooding, musing in the blessed arms of old ocean to the music of the thundering machinery. Every night as I go to bed—and I don't generally get to bed until about midnight—there are so many things to see, especially the changing glories of sea and sky, the moon and stars, the phosphorescent waves, and immeasurable blackness beyond—every night I am soothed to slumber by the throbbing of the great engine, and the gentle rocking of the ship as it heaves up and down the long swells, and I float away in gorgeous visions, and take no note of time, until the terrible gong sounds close to my cabin door. It is proposed to steal that gong in order that we may sleep undisturbed until ten o'clock in the morning.

The modern steamship is a cosmopolitan world. It has a vast variety of humanity. Every passenger is an individuality. There is no repetition, no monotony. The elements are gathered from all over the earth—from Guatemala, Canada, California, Louisiana, Colorado, Ohio, Connecticut; from Chicago, New York, Boston, India, and from England, France and Germany, etc. It is a promiscuous, happy crowd. There are actors, artists, singers, commercial travelers, men of business, military officers, doctors, students, mining men, the Salvation Army lass, sports, priests, nuns, and Freethinkers, and we mingle without any friction. The priest and I can smoke a cigar together and talk of the weather without any idea of persecution for opinion's sake. We make acquaintances on the spur of the moment. We do not need any introductions. We simply talk whenever we meet, as if we had known each other all our lifetime. There is no conventionality; Mrs. Grundy puts in no appearance except on Sunday, and then she reigns somewhat indifferently. I must confess that Sunday was a little bit stupid. There was a smack of solemn Puritanism about it, seeing that we could not play cards, and there were church services, Catholic and Protestant and Salvation Army, which I did not attend. However, one could get a drink whenever he desired and play "craps," a curious mingling of religion and freedom. Even the Christians complained that the Sunday was a little tedious and appeared glad when it was over. People on board ship don't care much for the "Holy Sabbath." As we change the reckoning every day an hour or so, it is pretty difficult to keep track of the really "holy time." It grows uncertain as we fly over the sea, and one can't but think that every day is alike. The changing ocean and skies are a great enlightener of bigoted humanity.

In fact, those people who travel are not much bigoted. Even when I talk with the orthodox passenger I find a geniality and openness about him that would be impossible to find in a country village. Those who travel must to a certain extent "put yourself in his place." They can't keep in the shell. They must come out. They must see things. They must learn that the universe is broad and that there are a great many people in it as good as themselves and who do not believe as they do. One cannot take an ocean voyage without having his orthodoxy knocked a little askew, no matter how stiff his backbone may be.

We find on a steamship a kind of model commonwealth; about the way the world will be when we reach "the good time coming." The officers attend strictly to business and keep the ship on its right course, and clean and comfortable. What a blessing it will be when politicians do the same thing with the ship of state, instead of running all over the passengers, and making a mess generally, while the ship is very apt to strike on the rocks. Here the officers attend to the ship and let the passengers take care of themselves, with the single exception of the ridiculous Sunday law, and that, I should judge, is "more honored in the breach than the observance," even by church members. But generally the passengers are unhampered, and thus we have a genuine display of human nature, and on the whole we find that it develops pretty splendid qualities. Instead of each one retiring to his cabin and looking out for number one in luxurious selfishness, every man for himself and devil take the hindmost, there is a spirit of generosity and cooperation. They all try to make one another happy. They are ready to do any service. It is realized that we must depend upon one another for our pleasures, and after the first day we are good friends and neighbors all around. There is not a particle of religious motif; theology is a dead letter so far as action is concerned. We simply know that we are shut off from all other existence; that we are for the time being like a planet sailing through the immensities of space; and so we recognize the fact that it is only by mutual good will that we can relieve the tedium of the voyage, and therefore every one is ready to be sociable, to help entertain, to lend a hand, and contribute to the common fund of enjoyment. There is a true democracy on board ship.

I find all sorts of genius and talent here. We can talk on every subject and learn something; art, literature, science, business, politics, fashion, social reform. Every day I discover some one who can tell me things I didn't know before. This is a kind of university and every passenger is a professor of something. He or she can always give one a piece of information. Vast and varied experiences are concentrated in this little group of voyagers. And there is no pretense about it. It won't do for anybody to put on airs—for if he does he will be taken down. One must be free and easy as nature made him or he will be voted a bore. No fringes are allowed. Of course one can be a crank if he is built that way. Steamship life, while, like death, a great leveler, is at the same time a wonderful developer of originality. The vast ocean and boundless sky bring out the essential self. Artificial distinctions vanish, but idiosyncrasies have full sweep.

It is wonderfully interesting to follow the pathway of this mighty ship—to muse on what man has done from the canoe to this almost living glory of his imperial genius. What a fiery monster is the great engine as it works day and night! When we gaze down into the interior of the ship it seems as if we were looking into hell itself, so profound are the depths, in whose dismal shades and flashing gloom men work like bees, and keep the hot heart of the ship palpitating with resistless energy, and the magnificent hulk speeds on, which all the billows of the angry sea cannot prevent. What an evolution from the depths of time, this glorious, beautiful winged creature, with thunder and fire, majestically sweeping the unfathomable main!

What a picture of the universe, ever changing, is thus presented; sea and sky, wind and wave, moon and stars, clouds and mist, gold and silver light, masses of radiance, and the sea of humanity itself in its contrasts of splendor and toil. The floating, beautiful, brilliant, intellectual world above, and deep down the grime and sweat of ceaseless labor that makes possible all this attractive and resplendent scene. It is an experience not to be forgotten.

There is a remarkable array of dramatic and musical ability on board, and a concert was given for the benefit of the family of an engineer who was killed while on duty a trip or two ago. It was a brilliant affair, and was a great credit to the ship and the passengers, as well as to human nature, for the generosity of spirit manifested. However, there are exceptions to the general rule. When the Salvation Army lass—who, by the way, is a captain, and is going over to England in order that General Booth may furnish her with a husband, which I believe is the way that marriage is arranged in this organization; love has nothing to do with it; it is a matter of religious duty and command—when this captain was asked to contribute a sixpence for the benefit of this poor man's family, she replied that she must give all the money she had to the Salvation Army. She had nothing, it seems, for humanity as such. She had no spirit of universal benevolence. She was not working for man, but for the army. She could not help a suffering fellow-being simply because this being was outside the Salvation Army. What an iron despotism thus lays its hand on superstitious multitudes and prevents them from being truly and nobly generous! Again, this captain, who professes so much religious sweetness, in the course of a conversation with a fellow passenger who was politely maintaining his own principles, cried out, "That is a lie, sir, and you are a liar."

What a beautiful exhibition of Christian charity! Isn't there something of the Inquisition lurking in this ignorant fanaticism? It is the Salvation Army that would tear Hypatia to pieces in the madness of their blind faith. It needs but the opportunity to pour forth its volcanic fire of persecution.

What a drama one could write if he could bring into juxtaposition the elements of human nature aboard ship! All the history of the past might flash forth in one voyage. The steamship is a kind of magnet in the midst of the waters, and the electric currents of humanity run through her from all portions of the earth, although the connection is apparently severed.

A little "stowaway" was born on May 1st—a May blossom of humanity. I do not know what they will charge for his passage, but I guess he will get off scot-free, since he is young and spry. He is born an Englishman, if he so elects, for the British flag floats over him. I cannot welcome him, perhaps, as a countryman, only as a citizen of the world. Long life and happiness to the ocean stranger, coming Out of the everywhere into the here.

This afternoon, May 3d, a wreck swung by the ship, a desolate object—the masts broken, the sails dragging, the decks burned black and the sides broken in. What a reminder of the storms and perils of the sea! Through what awful sufferings the crew must have passed before they abandoned the tossing vessel, and dared their fortunes with the remorseless billows. In deathlike majesty the derelict rolled by, a tombstone of the sea, an emblem of human tragedy, while we, with sunshine, splendor, and rejoicing, swept onward, the ocean smiling, the skies beaming, land only a hundred miles away, and our hearts full of gladness and exultation: We could throw a biscuit on board as the shattered ship went on, sad, solemn, and solitary, without a single greeting to our crowded decks.

And anon a great steamship of the German line, only a mile or two distant, sweeps towering along, with sails spread, with rolling columns of smoke, and immense hulk, dashing into the sunshine until it is lost in the glittering horizon like a bird winging its way into skyey depths.

May 4th.—I have arrived safely, and am now in London enjoying the delightful hospitality of Charles Watts and family. Yesterday, at Southampton, I was met by Watts and Foote. It was truly like a wonderful dream. It was a royal day, indeed, and I can only suggest the grand inspirations of the occasion. Next week I shall have much to write of our splendid English allies. My heart is full of this beautiful welcome to new shores and new work.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Unexpected Has Happened.

A change—very temporary, we fear—has come over the spirit of the dreams of the pious New York Herald, as the following excerpts will show. In its issue of May 14th it prints a letter from its Tokio correspondent, Col. John A. Cockerill, which contains some information quite interesting to our Christian friends, and some fine satire concerning Christianity's "beautiful doctrines of peace, charity, and humanity." Colonel Cockerill says:

The one colossal reason that the foe of Japan always advances when discussing the right of the Japanese to control and direct their own affairs is the dreadful fact that they are not a Christian people. Being, from the Christian standpoint, mere pagans, he holds it is unwise for the enlightened and highly favored children of civilization in Europe and America to admit them to the blessed sisterhood of sanctified nations. This is, in the most intense sense, the argumentum ad hominem of the missionary, who would hold Japan as the world holds Turkey—until she accepts the cross and its faith.

The missionaries have been doing hard work here for many years. Long before the Perry expedition the Jesuits were here preaching the Word. When St. Francis Xavier was engaged in turning India from its Hindoo beliefs he sent converted Japanese agents to this country to preach and crusade. In 1549 the work began, and at the dawn of the seventeenth century the Catholics had one million converts in Japan. At the last counting they had thirty-five thousand. Nearly all of the Protestant churches have expensively missions here and they have been hammering for years. Altogether they have probably thirty thousand communicants. The Orthodox Greek church has eighteen thousand, according to best estimates.

As for the Japanese, it is quite evident that they are taking upon themselves a civilization to which they cannot well adjust their ancient Shinto and Buddhist philosophies. The dull, leaden doubt of despair of Ecclesiastes is falling upon Japan. The temples are attended but indifferently, and the attendants are, for the most part, old people, ignorant peasants, and children. Agnosticism is spreading. The fact that so little has been achieved for Christianity in over three hundred years, despite the fact that the missionaries have labored so zealously and that most of them are allowed $100 for each child born unto them while toiling in this vineyard, is somewhat discouraging.

The son of Japan who handles a telegraph instrument, the lever of a locomotive, or who delves in the sciences provided him in the universities, may hold to his old Confucian code of ethics, but he will not be found much, I suspect, in the temples of his ancestors, and the question is, whether, in this day of saddening skepticism and indifference, he can be even led to look favorably upon the religion born of Nazareth.

There are people here who hope that one of these fine days an imperial edict will lift Japan from her so-called paganism into the full light of Christianity, but this is neither possible nor likely to occur.

If it be impossible for the evangelists who are laboring so hard to convert Japan's 45,000,000 people to Christianity to make but little impression upon her rock-ribbed paganism, may it not become necessary for the emperor to invite the civilized powers of the earth to come over and bombard the country into the true faith, in order that Japan may sit gracefully and independently in the grand council of the nations? The question is now, Can Japan, which seems to require no serious religion, be brought to Christianity, with its hell, its heaven, and its beautiful doctrines of peace, charity, and humanity, or will a new and more "advanced" religion find birth in this almost barren field?

Is the son of America who handles the telegraph instrument, the lever of the locomotive, or delves in the sciences provided in the universities more likely than the son of Japan who does the same to be found often in the temples of his ancestors, the Christian conventicles and cathedrals? That is terrible sarcasm, the suggestion of Colonel Cockerill that it may become necessary for the Christian powers to go over and bombard Japan "into the true faith." Of course he was not unaware that that has ever been the preferred Christian method of evangelization. But it remained for the editor of the Herald to give the finishing touches to this picture of Christianity in the East. In the issue of May 15th we find this editorial comment on Colonel Cockerill's letter and questions suggested thereby:

Colonel Cockerill's letter published in yesterday's Herald is one which deserves the earnest study of the religious world of the West and of the believers in the immaculacy of our boasted civilization. Japan has won her victories not because of her intense nationalism and inherited prowess, but because she had the innate genius to choose from our civilization what was necessary only to her material advancement. Among her forty-five millions of people there are only fifty thousand Christians, and it is safe to say that after the conclusion of the present war there will be few leading Japanese statesmen who will be inclined to look with favor on the introduction of more of the sort of Christian civilization that has made itself so selfishly prominent during the last few weeks. We have seen during that time the most powerful European nations, professing the glories of the Christian religion, striving, not to assist Japan on her pathway to the highest civilization, but exerting all their influence and menacing her with diabolical threats to the end that they in their stupendous greed may still gain a few more decades of years in which to milk the bloated cow of Confucius for their own pecuniary benefit. Planting the various flags of Christian civilization on their war vessels, they have tried to stay Japan's advance and to prevent the young standard bearer of temperate and commercial Western civilization getting a foothold and letting the light of Western education and science into the benighted world of the further East. So far as Japan is concerned the Island Empire will presumably advance on the lines she has hitherto marked out for herself. She will absorb all the material good from the West she is capable of assimilating, but she has had such a miserable lesson in Christian virtues and justice as it is taught by the European powers as will force her to leave Christianity a long while untouched. Buddhism and Shintoism may have to be burnished up a little, but they will be far more acceptable for long years to come to the millions of Japan than the creeds of Western powers which, interpreted as they have been, have taught them that the best, and in fact only, means for the self-preservation of a new empire is to select for employment in offense and defense from among the thousand glories of our boasted civilization efficient war ships, splendid guns, repeating rifles, perfected military organization and the achievements of science—most of which we ourselves have styled the works and inventions of the devil, and none of which are the absolute results of Christianity.

Paste that last admission of the truth in your scrap books; it is wonderful, coming from the eminently religious Herald.

Georgia at It Again.

A special telegram announces that J. Q. Allison, a Seventh-Day Adventist of Douglas county, Ga., has been arrested for working on Sunday, says the American Sentinel. He is to be tried this week. Mr. Allison, if convicted, will, according to the Georgia statute, "be punished by a fine not to exceed one thousand dollars, imprisonment not to exceed six months, to work in the chain-gang on the public works, or on such other works as the county authorities may employ the chain-gang, not to exceed twelve months, and any one or more of these punishments may be ordered in the discretion of the judge."

In case a fine is imposed, Section 4582 of the Georgia Code makes the following provisions for its disposal:

All moneys arising from fines imposed for offenses, the gist of which consists in their being committed on the Sabbath day, shall be paid to the ordinary of the county, to be by him distributed for the purpose of establishing and promoting Sabbath-schools in the county.

In case the convicted party refuses to pay fines, or in case he is sentenced to the chain-gang, Section 4814 provides:

In all cases where persons are convicted of misdemeanor, and sentenced to work in the chain-gang on the public works, or public roads, or when such persons are confined in jail for non-payment of fines imposed for such misdemeanor, the ordinary of the county, and where there is a board of commissioners of roads and revenues of the counties, then said board of commissioners, and in those counties where there is a county judge, then the said county judge, where such conviction was had, or where such convicts may be confined, may place such convicts, in the county or elsewhere, to work upon such public works of the county, in chain-gangs, or otherwise, or hire out such convicts, upon such terms and restrictions as may subserve the ends of justice, and place such convicts under such guards as may be necessary for their safe keeping.

In case of "insurrection" (which would doubtless include a refusal to work in the chain-gang on the [Biblical] Sabbath), Section 4821 provides:

Whenever any convict or convicts now confined, or hereafter to be confined, in the penitentiary of this state, or member or members of the chain-gang now confined, or hereafter to be confined, in the penitentiary of this state, or wherever else employed as such, shall be guilty of insurrection or attempt at insurrection, such convict or convicts, or member or members of the chain-gang, shall, upon trial and conviction in the Supreme Court of the county in which the crime is committed, be deemed guilty of a capital offense, and punished with death, or such other punishment as the judge in his discretion may inflict.

Thus it appears that Mr. Allison is facing as a possibility, first, a thousand-dollar fine; second, six months' imprisonment; third, the chain-gang; fourth, all three combined; fifth, he faces the possibility of being sold to the highest bidder, to some contractor, and in either case whether in the chain-gang of the state, or of the private contractor, should he refuse to work on the Sabbath, as he surely would, he "may be punished with death!"

The state of Georgia is not in Russia; it is in the southeastern part of the United States, and professed Protestant churches are behind this barbarous Sunday law.

Observations.

I cannot concur in the decision of the courts that a single unlawful passage in a book or paper vitiates the entire publication. Such a ruling is not sustained by analogy. There is the human body, passages of which are open to criticism, but its circulation is still permitted. As a case in point, take the Rev. Mr. Talmage. He is not altogether objectionable personally, yet putting his mouth in evidence, and following the court decisions, he would have to be condemned as a hole.

The Catholic Union and Times quotes some good-natured remarks from the San Francisco Star and heads them "A Protestant Editor on the Sisters of Charity." I was personally acquainted for some years with Mr. James Barry, editor of the Star, and can testify that the clergymen of San Francisco do not regard him as a Protestant journalist. He is a Single Taxer, but has no other hope of paradise. He served on the Fourth of July committee one year. The question of opening the Independence Day exercises with prayer came up, and a member of the committee moved that the Rev. Horatio Stebbins, Unitarian, should be engaged. Mr. Barry objected on the ground that prayer by a Unitarian parson was just the same as having no mummery at all, which would suit him better. "To the devil with your ministers," said he—for so Mr. Barry expresses his thought when in calm discussion. "To hell with your ministers. If you've got to have a sky-pilot, give us, by Godfrey, a blankity-dashed good pot-bellied Catholic priest." Such was his language, and the committee arose.

I should guess that Barry was raised a Catholic and that his family are Catholics now—he being indifferent, except that he favors fair play and no gouging. I am quite sure that the editor of the Union and Times, in quoting him as a Protestant editor, is catching at a straw, which religious editors should never do unless there is something good in a glass at the other end of it.

About the first of March last a grocer named Stratmann, of Louisville, Ky., was brought into the court presided over by one Judge Thompson and arraigned for the offense of "being found at his calling on the Sabbath day." A Baptist theological student appeared as the prosecuting witness, and Stratmann, who is a German, pleaded guilty as charged. He admitted "being found at his calling," which was an honest one, "on the Sabbath day," but having been reared in the Old World, which is governed by tyrants instead of Baptists, he was insensible that by thus minding his own business he would offend against the people of the state of Kentucky and their dignity. He retained no counsel, as, being innocent of either harmful act or intent, he felt sure that he would need no defense before a just judge. But that was where Mr. Stratmann fooled himself, for Judge Thompson fined him five dollars and costs and remanded him pending the payment of the same. The clergymen of Louisville went into throes of elation over this decision, and called a meeting at which all the yelloquence at their command was evoked to the glory of Judge Thompson. One minister felicitated the assemblage on the brightening prospects of the cause under such rulings, which he termed "righteous," and another said: "Judge Thompson is a fine type of a Christian on the bench."

Encouraged by this enthusiastic praise of his feeble efforts to vindicate the sanctity of the Sabbath, Judge Thompson has made a more powerful one to vindicate the sanctity of the marriage tie, and he was not turned from his course by the contingency that in doing this he must commend one of the basest murders that ever went unrecorded as such. But what is life compared to sanctity? Let us proceed.

Two weeks ago Fulton Gordon came before this same Judge Thompson with blood upon his hands and clothes. He had just murdered his wife and a young man named Brown; but when he explained that the woman seemed to like Brown better than himself, and that Brown accepted the situation, Judge Thompson assured him that his apology was adequate and even handsome, and that the court could not find him guilty of a wrong. The judge did not even insult the widowed Gordon by inquiring if he owned the deceased female; it was not necessary, for no gentleman will shoot a lady whom he has not previously promised on his oath and honor to love, cherish, and protect. How the Louisville ministers regard this second decision has not transpired, but being in a line with the first it probably makes the prospects of their cause look even brighter than they were just after Grocer Strammann's conviction. Under such an administration of justice by their "fine type of a Christian on the bench" who ought to be in the penitentiary, it is a waste of time and eternity for them to wait on the formalities of arresting and convicting the Sabbath-breaker. They have only to take the law, the gospel, and the gun in their own hands and shoot him as he breaks.

It is to be noted that the code of Louisiana, like that of Kentucky, permits the citizen to begin firing whenever he discovers the female of his species in consort with a rival male. An illustration has just appeared in New Orleans, where Dr. S. P. Schwing, suspicious of conjugality between Mrs. Schwing and Dr. Emile Hiriart, sought the first opportunity to pump his brother physician full of lead. The learned Judge Whitaker, who had this case before him, after consulting the audience and his own political interests, declared that there was nothing against the defendant and ordered his release from custody. Dr. Schwing omitted to kill his wife, which was almost criminal carelessness, since if through some judicial oversight the case had come to trial she might have given testimony upon which the jury would be compelled to convict.

These incidents, gaining currency abroad, might carry the impression that we have a punctilious regard for the marriage obligation, but other facts contradict that theory, for the localities where such outbreaks of brute instinct occur return the ripest and richest and most opulent crop of scandals. Nor is it to be inferred that human life is quoted at a low figure by the sticklers for the code. Life is not held cheap except by the one who gets the drop on his adversary, while the latter will make as high speed as he is capable of to get out of range. One reason for judicial leniency is that live men have votes and the dead ones have lost theirs. The case, then, is that marriage does not necessarily place the male under moral restraint; it is merely a legal formality conferring upon him a license to cause the decease of other males intervening, with her consent, between himself and the female with whom he is more than with others paired.

Mr. W. L. Sheldon, who holds plow for the Ethnicalists of St. Louis, has produced a book for the young and labeled it the "Story of the Life of Jesus." A reviewer states that the author has eliminated the supernatural and miraculous elements from the accounts of the carpenter's son, and that the present biography says nothing about the visions of Joseph and Mary, the temptation of Christ by Satan, nor anything else not admissible to Ethical circles. This is throwing away the husk and retaining the cob, I should say; for, devoid of hocus, the Galilean appears to have been a quite ordinary type of the sort of people whose mission it is to make us tired. His "Life," when he is so viewed, wouldn't be "Hamlet" with the prince of Denmark left out altogether, but it would be strictly analogous to a version of that play with all reference to Hamlet's insanity expunged.

It is reported that not more than two hundred persons attended Colonel Ingersoll's lecture in Dover, N. H., on May 4th, although it was so well advertised that everybody in the city must have been aware that it was to be delivered. This intelligence does not surprise me in the least, for I know the kind of country New Hampshire is—that is, I know what it used to be, and I understand it is worse now. Ethnologists tell us there is such a thing as a state of arrested development. I believe New Hampshire is the state referred to. About ten years ago I happened to be there when Ingersoll lectured in Keene, a city of six thousand inhabitants, rather more than one hundred of whom were at the speaking. It cost the Colonel $50 for the privilege of addressing that audience. I bought two tickets and took a female relation to the lecture. She was a school-teacher, and not pious in an orthodox sense, but throughout the evening, except at one point, she maintained toward the orator an attitude of the most austere severity. She did unbend once and nod her head in approval, although I was not certain what it was that pleased her. On the way home I took occasion to inquire the cause of her complaisance, and she replied that no one could help indorsing Mr. Ingersoll's views on music and grammar when he expressed them so eloquently.

He hadn't said a word about grammar, but as an allusion to the "drama" occurred in the course of his remarks I suppose she misunderstood him. I had no doubt that in a discussion of the parts of speech and the art of using them with propriety, she and the Colonel would substantially agree, while as to the value of the theater they might diverge, so I let it go as it was.

The people of Dover might not have been helped very much if they had all turned out to hear Colonel Ingersoll. He has said himself that there is no use in boosting anybody who is not trying to climb, and where the party is shinning down, the case is a good deal more hopeless.

Premier Rosebery of England is afflicted with insomnia, and among those who have told him what to take for it is the Rt. Hon'ble W. E. Gladstone, who recommends the study of ancient theology. I know of nothing more likely to put a man to sleep, except modern theology as expounded from the contemporary pulpit. Mr. Gladstone is an unrelenting producer of literature on the subject of those antique superstitions by him called ancient theology, so that, like a homeopathic doctor, he is prepared to furnish the material for the dose which he prescribes.

The Supreme Court has finally decided that the Income tax is unconstitutional. While bowing to the whim of Providence, it is not irreverent to note the fact that each of the judges condemning the measure enjoys an income that would be taxable under it.

The New York Voice is vaunting itself just now over the following conundrum, which it stumps the silver advocates to answer: "Why should the ratio between gold and silver be fixed at 16 to 1 or 15 to 1? Why not put the two metals on an exact equality?" That is the reductio ad absurdum, or fool question. What would be the dimensions of a $20 piece if gold were fifty cents an ounce, or what the dimensions of a dime with silver at sixty-five cents a pennyweight? The exceeding inconvenience of such a ratio is an answer to the Voice.

Asking questions is the easiest way of appearing to argue. For example—Question in prohibition: If a man should be imprisoned for selling liquor, why should he not be hanged? Another: Mr. John Doe went to a saloon, got drunk, went home, and killed his wife. Mrs. Richard Roe went to church, got religion, went home, and sacrificed her child. Child as dead as woman—what are you going to do about it? Comparing the number and frequency of church and saloon attendance, as much quarreling is done over religion as over rum, and anyone would be well within the bounds of truth who should assert that more deeds of heroism, kindness, and generosity are done under the influence of ardent spirits than under the impulses of the spirit described as holy. Why not place the two sources of inspiration on a parity? Question in finance: If the government on a nominal basis or reserve of one hundred millions of gold can maintain a circulation of one thousand millions of credit money, why can it not maintain sixteen times as much on the same amount of gold? This last question is twin brother to the one asked by the Voice, and equally deserving of a square answer, which it will not get.

Something ought to be done at once to give our jingo ministers and newspaper editors a chance to work off their superfluous belligerency. The ministers are arming and drilling the young of their congregations, and the editors are calling for standing armies, warships, coast defenses, and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine. Is there no way to bring these bloodthirsties together on opposite sides of some question, so that they may take it out of each other and give the community a rest? The case is urgent, for there are in this country a good many thousand of inflammable brains liable to be ignited by warlike preaching and journalizing, and, with such an administration as they would be likely to elect, we would be involved in war over Hawaii, Corinto, or the Nicaragua ditch. Then, after an expensive, bloody, and disastrous conflict, it might occur to the people that it was the clerical and journalistic jingoes who got them into the scrape and that the best thing for future public safety would be to hang or drown a few of them. I once saw a man set a dog on a cow that was peacefully grazing near-by; but the cow kicked the dog, which came yelping back and bit the man severely in the leg. As the man's act was a wanton one, he got no sympathy.

The third volume of Moncure D. Conway's edition of the collected works of Thomas Paine is now on sale. Price, $2.50.

A Little More Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to anything good.

"An Important Intimation."

There are, we regret to say, between one thousand and two thousand of our friends who have allowed their subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to expire without renewing. This is a considerably larger portion than is pleasant to us, who depend upon the more or less prompt payment of subscriptions for the wherewithal to meet our bills. Now, we are not going to get angry, or scold, or do anything disagreeable about this, but we must appeal to our friends' good nature and generous feelings to remedy this deplorable and unsatisfactory state of affairs. We need the money badly—so do our creditors. The paper man, and the printer, and the compositor, and the mailer, and the post-office collector, and the clerks, and the landlord, and the insurance man, and the gas man, and the devil are always with us, not to mention the rest, and they all want money and want it bad, and want it when it is due. And when we haven't got it for them life is a burden—they make it so intentionally, blast 'em.

So now, as aforesaid, we appeal to our friends all over this country—thousands of them—to send the amount of their arrearages and as much in advance as they have been behind, to sort of even things up and turn about in fair play, as it were. A year's subscription from each one whose time has expired will make us easy—very easy—but if we can't have that then let us have what you can spare, and we will "grin and bear it" until you get the balance. The amounts are small individually and easily raised, but to us they collectively mean a good deal—just the difference between being even with the world and being unpleasantly behind.

The disciples of a certain philosopher, one day missing their teacher from his accustomed place in the midst of them, sought him at his unpretentious lodgings, where they discovered that he was suffering from the lack of a Square Meal. Of course they hastened to provide him with all that the inner sinner could desire, but he nevertheless took occasion to jab them with a moral pointed by the event. "Know, then" (said he), "that in order that you may permanently enjoy the light of a lamp, it is necessary occasionally to replenish the Oil."

Delinquents who renew at once will be spared the moral which their remissness might tempt us to draw.

There is always a demand for inexpensive tracts for general distribution. We have endeavored to supply that demand, and the reader who looks on page 333, this issue, will find a long list of them.

A Freethinking Wife's Eulogy of Her Freethinking Husband.

What the Sun pronounces an "unusual, not to say remarkable," funeral oration was recently pronounced by Mrs. Turner over the body of her husband, the Hon. Isaac M. Turner, of Grand Rapids, Mich., who died of consumption after a lingering illness. There were no other funeral exercises:

"I feel that I must say a word here above the bier of my dead hero, for all that is best in life I owe to him. While living he was for all, but, being dead, he is mine alone. When I would speak, for many of you here were friends of his, and, through him only, friends of mine.

"You who knew him in his professional or public life, knew him to love and esteem. I know that from your presence here; but I think it must have been that he was at his best in his private life. In his home, with his friends, in his library, was certainly where he found life's fullest meaning and highest enjoyment. And if in public life he ever found it necessary to be stern or appear harsh, yet it was his nature to be kind and gentle; for he was ever a lover of little children, and lover and protector of all domestic pets, a lover of flowers and forests, and of that gentle mystic mood of nature of which his favorite poets sang so eloquently. Perhaps he did not possess the technicalities of exact scholarship, yet he was a profound student in many departments of research; he was familiar with the wide sweep and tendencies of history, as well as with its more particular phases. He was a lover of the literature of all ages and nations. It was a maxim with him that in a knowledge of universal literature was to be found the widest culture.

"His Anglo-Saxon blood made him a fearless lover of the truth, and a fearless advocate of the rights of the individual. With him the human soul in its full integrity should acknowledge no authority either to church or state, except indeed in so far as had been mutually agreed upon for the good of all. Yet, claiming this preeminent position for himself, you would not find a man more modest and more considerate for others.

"His life was cast upon a generous mold, his love and sympathy were as wide as humanity, his interest as wide as nature. The less fortunate in life found in him a true friend and helper, and he was the peer of many upon their own more limited platform.

"He was made of the stuff from which heroes are made. It was ever his lot to struggle, it was his to endure, and it was his to attain. To struggle, to endure, to attain; that makes the cycle of human life, and his was not incomplete, though his forty-three years seemed all too short.

"During the fifteen years of our wedded life there has never been a winter nor a summer gone by, but at the turning of the seasons I have heard the rustling of the robes of the angel of death. The shadow of her wing has been over us at all times. There has never been a fond ambition for this world's fair prospects but has been gently shrouded on her breast. My sorrow is great, but it is without bitterness, except in so far as contrition and remorse will come with the recollection that I might have been more tender and loving to one whose life was so unequally matched with fate.

"I cannot stand here above the wreck of so much promise and say that I believe that it is the will of Providence, for I do not. God does not will such heartbreaking things. I can take no comfort in the platitudes that the mysteries of Providence are past human understanding. Humanity itself has been intrusted with the high problem of working out its own salvation, and it is humanity's part to see that such inconsolable things do not happen. Humanity, by investigation, research, and effort, must fulfil the destiny stamped upon its brow. To base my faith upon the postulate that somewhere at some time in the universe this must be compensated is an unsubstantial position, for there is no compensation. There can be none, except in so far as human effort can prevent the happening of such untimely occurrences.

"But weep not for him, for all has ended in peace; weep for me and for mine, if you will; but weep not for him, for his life went out upon triumphant lines. No imperial guard ever died at his post of duty more nobly than did our hero, and I pray that his life may still be a hope and inspiration to me, and not a mere memory, however sweet and sacred that will always be. Weep not for him. Chant no funeral dirge. Let no minor strains of woe accompany the flight of his spirit. We will not say dust to dust and ashes to ashes, but life to life and spirit to spirit. Weep not for him, for I say his life has gone out upon triumphant lines, and let dominant triumphant chords weave the harmony that would echo the flight of his soul."

Lovest Thou Me?

Thy proselytes, O Nazarene, adore thee
And call thee "Lord;"
They mind when they shall come before thee
For their reward.

Remove that bribe, let be that thou art human,
Of mortal clay,
And from thee every son of woman
Will fall away.

They will denounce thee madman and impostor
As suits their ends,
And never one would join the roster
Of thy true friends.

Thy friends are they whom neither threat nor promise
Brings to thy side,
Who stand, like unbelieving Thomas,
Unsatisfied.

Such souls and thou wilt not be disappointed
In one another;
They love thee not as the anointed,
But as a brother.

They love thee not for any expectation
Of heavenly gain,
But for thy deep commiseration
For her of Nain.

They love thee, not for anything thou art
Above the rest,
But that thy work was wholly for the part
Of the oppressed.

Yet some believe, with sycophantic spirits
Heaven will be crammed;
While he who loves too well to fear it's Sure to be damned.

MENANDER DAWSON.

The Celebration in Memory of Thomas Paine.

As next Thursday is Decoration Day, the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, Manhattan Liberal Club, and Newark Liberal League will repair to New Rochelle in one body and hold memorial exercises at the monument of Thomas Paine. A general invitation has been extended to all who appreciate the work done by Thomas Paine, whether as a revolutionist in America, a lover of liberty in France, or as a Freethinker; and a good many have responded to the invitation. The train leaves the Grand Central depot at 10:45 A.M., but those who are going should be at the station about 10:30 A.M., which will give time to make friends and to procure seats in comfort. The speakers will include Henry Rowley, T. B. Wakeman, Chas. H. Matchett, Rev. F. E. Mason, and Wm. Warwick, one of the founders of the Brooklyn Association. Dr. Foote, Jr., will preside. The speaking will commence about one o'clock, and last about two hours, after which, according to the tastes and desires of those present, games and various social amusements can be arranged. Under the direction of J. R. Macdonald an original hymn, written by Geo. E. Macdonald, will be sung. The wall and gate around the monument are to be repaired by May 30th, and the contractor promises they will stand for many years. A book will be taken in which every Freethinker and admirer of Paine who attends the celebration is expected to write his or her name and address, the book to be preserved as a memento of the occasion. The tickets for the round trip will cost fifty cents, and are good for any one to return on any train preferred. Tickets can be procured at this office.

Regarding the Memorial Book, Corresponding Secretary Thomas Duntze, of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association, writes: "In this connection I should thank you to add to your notice of our celebration, that there will be a book at the monument in which all friends of Thomas Paine can register their names and addresses. Wearers of the 'Memorial badge' only will be entitled to enter their names in this book."

In Sarcastic Vein.

The rulers of old-world monarchies ought to emigrate to the United States. Their methods of governing are obsolete and played out. Heresies of all kinds thrive and flourish in their dominions, and armies and navies can do nothing to check them. In the United States alone do virtue and piety really triumph over vice and infidelity. We do not bother ourselves about forms and externals, but we secure the substance all the same. Fine phrases have no effect on our legislators, and we have no difficulty in passing laws calculated to promote morality and religion. How easy it was for us to suppress lotteries and gambling of all kinds—evils which are as yet in full play in less pious countries. We know how to get things done when we are really bent on having them done. Our rulers rule. Our citizens obey. No more patriotic country exists on the face of the earth; no more law-and-order-loving people has ever been known. Our masters require no trappings, no stage-thunder, no divine-right nonsense. We appeal to two things exclusively—to piety and the pocket. What the pocket is incapable of accomplishing we leave to piety; and where piety fails the pocket is sure to respond. The credit of discovering this marvelous combination belongs to us. In Hawaii piety and pocket crushed an idolatrous monarchy and established a Christian republic; in this country we keep the people pure, economical (they haven't much to spend), and patriotic. There is no chance for theorists and cranks. They have absolutely no influence in our halls of legislation. There only God and the Dollar are recognized.—Liberty.

Great Reductions in Standard Freethought Works.

The popularity of our missionary scheme, by which Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is being scattered broadcast by the thousands, has induced us to lower the price of his other works, with the hope that they too will have a wider reading. From this date the prices of Paine's books will be as follows:

AGE OF REASON. Paper, 25 cents. Eight copies sent to as many different addresses for $1. Cloth, 50 cents.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPHECIES. Paper, 15 cents.

COMMON SENSE. The argument that did more than any other to convince the Revolutionary leaders of the necessity of the separation of this country from Great Britain. Paper, 15 cents.

THE CRISIS. Paine's great Revolutionary writings. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Answer to Burke's attack on the French Revolution. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PAINE'S GREAT WORKS IN ONE VOLUME. 8vo., 800 pp., cloth, $3, leather $4, morocco, gilt edges, $4.50. This book and THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, $5.

PAINE'S POLITICAL WORKS. One volume containing Common Sense, Crisis, and Rights of Man. Cloth, $1.

PAINE'S THEOLOGICAL WORKS. One volume containing Age of Reason, Examination of the Prophecies, Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff, Essay on Dreams, Letters, etc. With Life of Paine and steel portrait. Cloth, $1.

We trust all our readers will do their best to scatter these splendid works all over the country.

Letters of Friends.

Here's More for the Pictorial Text-Book.

CLEVELAND, O., April 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book."

CHARLES FUNK.

DODGE CITY, KAN., May 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3, for which please send your paper and "Pictorial Text-Book" to J. D. Allen.

Respectfully, C. M. BOROUR.

THE DALLES, OR., April 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have just received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER offering the paper one year and the "Pictorial Text-Book" for $3. I inclose money in this for the same. From a new subscriber,

W. J. TURRELL.

CEDAR BLUFFS, NEB., May 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For inclosed $3 please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" according to advertisement, and for the twenty-five cents send a Secular Marriage and Funeral Ritual. THOS. LORENZEN.

LODI, WIS., May 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You sent me sample copy of paper. Have looked it over and like it very much, and made up my mind to subscribe for same. I accept your offer of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, $3. Respectfully yours, A. VANDERPOEL.

DENVER, COL., May 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send you to-day $4.50. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to Mr. J. Goodman and for six months to Daniel A. Doughty; and send me the "Pictorial Text-Book" as per your offer.

I am glad to do something for our grand cause, as the more Freethinkers the better will become our chance for happiness. Yours respectfully, I. N. SHORE.

WORCESTER, MASS., April 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: If I had the means I would call for literature enough to flood this part of the country. I got some excellent books of friend W. B. Clark, and distributed them. Mr. Clark is helping the good cause very much, and I wish I were able to do as much, although I will inclose $5 for the good old paper and "Pictorial Text-Book," and the pamphlets named.

Hoping you and your good work may prosper, I will close.

SYLVANUS B. NORMAN.

EUGENE, OR., April 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Waiting with prospect of sending new subscribers makes me tardy in renewal. I inclose twenty-five cents extra for "Ingersoll on the Bible." Also the name and money of Mr. Samuel Wascheur, for paper and "Pictorial Text-Book." I gladly hail all of our Freethought family, with a cordial hurrah for our brave and active workers. I am delighted with the zeal and success of our few lady Liberals of Oregon.

Respectfully, J. C. SNODGRASS.

Hope You Can.

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., May 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find herewith 50 cents, for which mail me "All About the Holy Bible" and "The Great Ingersoll Controversy." Should also be pleased to have your trade discount on your publications, being a partner in a concern dealing in notions, etc. Am quite sure we could dispose of some of the books.

Respectfully, M. M. FIFE.

One of God's Mistakes.

BLOCTON, ALA., May 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received your sample and marked copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am much obliged for them. I have been buying my TRUTH SEEKERS from a news store here regularly for about three years. I have preferred to do so on account of having it displayed there to get other subscribers. There are three of us subscribing now, but I would take advantage of your liberal premium of the "Pictorial Text-Book" but I am not financially able at present. In the future, if the offer remains good, I shall do so.

Inclosed is twenty-five cents, for which please send me the ANNUAL for 1895. The churches are combined here now, and have erected a tent, and call it a Tabernacle, where all the birds of a feather flock together. I hear that the imported gospel sharp they have insulted his Joss last Saturday night by saying that an Infidel is to be pitied, as you could put his brain into a grain of mustard-seed and hear it rattle. So, of course, as according to his doctrine God created everything, he must be the one to blame for not giving Infidels more brain. JOS. STOKES.

Lays It All to Monopoly.

CELINA, O., May 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I come to pay my dues to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Now, Mr. Editor, I see in my paper so much talk of hard times and very little about its cause. Now, I will be as brief as I can. Directly and indirectly the whole cause is monopoly. The next thing is how to stop this wholesale thieving. To my mind the first remedy is the ballot, the second is the boycott. Inclosed find $3 for my paper.

HENRY T. NICOM.

A Family Necessity.

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I notice that my subscription is about one month behind on your valuable paper, and as I have been a subscriber for these many years I cannot well afford to give up its welcome visits now, for it has become quite a permanent fixture in my family, and I feel that I should be left almost in the dark without its cheering light. We have a great supply of pure, unadulterated religion in this part of the country, but good morals are very scarce. Inclosed find $5, for which please send me the grand old TRUTH SEEKER for another two years.

D. S. WOODWORTH.

A Nautical Letter from a Nautical Friend.

April 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: After sailing many years in the old gospel ship of Orthodoxy through the fog of superstition, striking on the rocks of mental slavery, rolling on the billows of mental anguish, skirting the shoals of everlasting hell fire, sounding in the channel of Bible mystery, only to return to port with a cargo of doubt, and hearing of a new ship called Freethought, I concluded to try her for a trip. So when I had taken on board Paine's "Age of Reason" for a compass and THE TRUTH SEEKER for a chart, I spread the sails of investigation and sailed to Humboldt bay, and then to Mount Ingersoll, and back to Port Hartman, and then straight up Putnam Sound. I am now well ballasted and have no fear of capsizing before the gales of superstition. Instead of sailing in the bluff-bowed and clumsy-rigged ship of Superstition, I sail in the clear-lined and trim-rigged ship of Mental Liberty through the fog of superstition, guided by the light of Freethought. The rocks of mental slavery are blown up with reason; the billows of mental anguish are smoothed by the oil of investigation. I steer straight through the channel of Bible mystery with the compass of common sense, while the shoals of everlasting hell disappear in the broad sea of Humanity. W. CHINN.

The Modest Demands of the Preachers.

SONORA, TEX., April 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER has reached me only once in the last three and a half months, but I am looking for a bundle of back numbers this week from my brother, to whom you are mailing my paper. The few numbers I received before made me feel as I imagine the traveler in the desert feels when he finds one of those oases; when, after riding for days through the sand, his eyes feast on the sight of living water, fruit-bearing trees, and a carpet of green grass. Although I had abundance of reading matter, and heard plenty of speakers, THE TRUTH SEEKER represented to me the one oasis in the sand of the desert of the present hypocrisy. The little envelope I inclose to you was handed to me as I stepped into the Cumberland Presbyterian church of San Antonio, Tex., in which the well-advertised Moody was holding forth. The legend on the envelope: "Freely ye have received, freely give," reminded me that the Lord God has stopped payment since his son "paid it all." He has given freely to everybody, except to Mr. Moody, so Mr. Moody wants his hearers to understand, and therefore he falls back on the others who have freely received, and expects them to divide gifts with him who is working for the Lord, said Lord being so unjust as not to pay his servants. The preachers are boss geniuses in inventing devices to keep their dupes' left hands from knowing what their right hands do when it comes to giving freely for the support of these self-appointed servants of the Lord God.

A ten days' meeting has started in this town, and I was surprised to hear these preachers ask last Sunday night that the merchants and other business men close their places at 11 o'clock A.M. while the meeting lasted, so all could come and serve the Lord, and the Lord would see that they lost nothing in their trade by it. The preachers would be proud, they said, if they could tell the brethren when they returned to Eastern Texas that the people in Sonora closed their shops to give themselves to the service of God. This is the only town I have seen where there is any life at all since these hard times began, and these preachers seem, in their hurry, to want to pick the goose before the feathers are grown. There were some nickels collected and some hand-shaking done.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER the success it deserves so well, and hoping it will always keep in its straightforward way of speaking, I inclose $1.65 for "Age of Reason" and other pamphlets. A. SCHUBERT.

It Might Have Been.

NEW BOSTON, MICH., May 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: When Alphonso, king of Spain, revolted at the cumbersomeness of the Ptolemaic theory of astronomy with its numberless cranks and circles, its cycles and epicycles, and said in disgust, "If I had been consulted at the creation, I could have done better than that," he only voiced a modern sentiment. He felt that things ought to have been made better. So do we.

There is undeniably a wonderful adaptation of nature to man, or of man to nature, whichever way you view it. But it is folly to say that the perfection of adaptation has been reached, or that everything is as good as it might be. A conceived human nature dictates possible improvements, and we ask, Why was it not so? It might have been.

If the moon was made to give light by night, why does it not do so instead of being off more than half the time flirting with the sun?

Why does everything float one season and dry up the next? Why does rot attack the choicest fruit? Why should there be such an affinity between cutworms and corn? In what way is clover helped by the midge or wheat by weevil? For what purpose was chess or ragweed created? In whose honor was the Canada thistle developed? To whose glory does the musketo murmur, the lightning lighten, the hurricane howl, or the cyclone cycle?

Of what practical value are rattlesnakes and skunks? Has anyone discovered a use for fleas, lice, tomato worms, or potato bugs? Why should nature fill the cracks in a bedstead with her special pattern, flat model, live timekeepers?

Verily, "if I had been consulted at the creation, I could have done better than that." I would have had a few things different. Some uncertainties would have been certain; a few certain things would have been decidedly otherwise. We would know whether Mars is inhabited or not. The "proper" mode of baptism would be definitely known. I would destroy the bacillus typhus, the bacillus tuberculosis, and all the other bacilli pathogenic.

Some funerals would be indefinitely postponed, and some others would be hastened. Cancer's devilish gnawings and gangrene's horrible sloughings would be unknown; lock-jaw and diphtheria strangers to the realm.

If I had my way, people would belong to the right political party; the demagogue's day would be done. The town-lookers would look for work, and young folks would appreciate the value of time.

The mental faculties would be properly developed. The perceptive powers would be acute enough to tell light from dark and good from evil. The intuitive power would move more quickly and clearly cognize infinities.

Memory would retain better things than people's faults, pointless yarns, or ichthyic myths. The imagination would have created nobler structures than imps and idols, satyrs and satans, gods, ghosts, and goblins, dudes, demons, and devils. Reason would never entertain miracles and mythologies. Long life and happiness would be attainable, and marriage certificates would not be lottery tickets.

FRANK E. ROMINE.

After the Materialists Again.

BAY CITY, MICH., May 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: "A wee small voice crying in the wilderness saying, Prepare ye for the coming of the Lord;" but I will substitute the word "truth" for "Lord," as the former contains all the virtues and attributes of heaven's blessings. I find more Liberal thought in many places in my travels through the states and territories than most stay-at-homes would imagine to exist. The facts are that thousands of those with whom I come in contact are simply seeking for the truth, and in reality are much more liberal than most of the chosen leaders of our Freethought associations. No greater bigots can be found in the church that would burn those of different views at the stake, as heretics, than can be found among those who think themselves Liberals, for when anyone will skulk behind his own belief, or so-called demonstrated truths, and use such as breast-works, in the shelter of which to decry all other beliefs, and seek no further to know the truth, he should be left alone to his idols, to enjoy the blessings of ignorance.

It matters not what we believe to-day, we should continue to seek for truth; and as evidence comes to break the convictions of to-day, we should accept the new-born development in all things.

No human being has ever lived who could know it all; and many who we have thought knew the most have in some instances been found to have really known the least.

How few of our Materialists care to know of what real material consists, or how far entity and matter accompany each other in their correlations. No stronger Materialist could have been found than I, but I find upon further research that neither matter nor entity (life) in its real entirety is, and probably never will be, fully understood by man, either in mortal or immortal life. Anyone can study Spencer, Huxley, et al., and become grounded in the ideas by them taught; but it is not so easy for every one to search for himself and know the later developments of nature's laws. I have become case-hardened to being called an "old fool" (which is true of us all) for spending money, time, and brain force in the investigation of Spiritualism, when at the same time I have learned more than a thousand bigots (excuse the expression) could tell me, and which they to-day condemn.

I have lately discovered a more developed nut for some of our Materialists to crack, and would know of the real source of germ-ego of the within life.

I bought two slates at one of the great department stores in Chicago, took them over two miles to an independent slate writing medium, and "fooled away" $2 to get the following phenomenon upon my slates: After attaching the slates by strings to the chandelier over my head, with a written question to my deceased daughter and a red postage stamp inclosed, thinking, perhaps, I might obtain a picture of some kind in colors, I then admitted the medium (who had left the room by my request before I had prepared the question or slates), who never touched the slates, but sat with me at a stand, ten feet distant. She soon informed me that I was getting a communication from some girl by the name of Gracie; she thought it was my daughter. In less than three minutes the writing ceased, and I took the slates down, to find a finely drawn sprig in three colors, and both slates plainly written full on the insides and without pencil, in daylight, giving a complete answer to my written question, and saying: "Papa, in answer to your mental question, I have drawn this little sprig in colors as emblematic of our love for you all; as the bud opens, so does our love for mankind expand," etc., all in the best of sentiment.

I have the slates at home with others, on which is written similar evidence of both mental and physical phenomena.

No teaching of occultism, in any of its branches, can account for the phenomena in any sense, and for anyone to say that I was psychologized, hypnotized, and deluded, is too silly for anyone to believe who has had one-half the experience I have had.

Mr. Macdonald, allow the light of truth to shine in all its brilliancy, "even though the heavens fall" and crush everyone who fears to learn more than he already thinks he knows. A. D. SWAN.

How He Thought Himself Out.

LORAIN, O., May 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER the story told by Talmage about the man of Lima, O., reminds me of one I heard a minister of the gospel tell when at my home in Freepport—a small town in the southern part of this state.

The Rev. Mr. Baker, of the Methodist Episcopal church of that place, had the face (if you will permit the expression) to stand up before a seemingly intelligent audience of about two or three hundred persons and tell the following story, as nearly as I can repeat it:

He was preaching in one of the backwoods towns (of which he omitted the name—they always do—and it was well he did so) a few years before, and there was a noted infidel there who became dangerously ill—he did not say whether it was on account of his preaching or not—as the hour of death drew near, the devil came—eager to claim his soul the moment it left the body—and rattled his chains, which act so frightened the ones who were waiting on the sick man that they fled, leaving him to fight death and the devil alone. This continued several nights, and others went to watch and wait on the sick man, but were frightened away in like manner until they could get no one to stay at all. At length, when they went one morning to see how the sick man had passed the night, they found the devil had seized his soul and carried it off to the regions of the damned, and left his body cold in death.

This is all the story; it was told at a protracted meeting, and perhaps was intended to do good—you know there are some Christians who believe in doing evil that good may come of it. Could any lasting good come of the above? Did any one in that audience believe it? I heard some of the indifferent ones laughing about it, but the staid old members of the church never mentioned it—they knew it was not true, and if it was, what must they think of a minister of the gospel who was so afraid of the devil, or had so little of the Christ-spirit about him (it must be one or the other) that he could see a human being left alone to suffer and to die and not offer his services? For one who has made devil-fighting his life-work, it looks inconsistent that he should stay away on Satan's first appearance in the neighborhood.

I want to tell you why I don't believe the Bible. I was brought up a Christian by Christian parents—they were very strict and would thrash me if I whistled or sang anything but hymns or Sunday-school songs on Sunday. They made me stay in the house and study the Shorter Catechism hot Sunday afternoons, when I might better have been out under the trees gathering flowers. I learned it, but now it is as so much rubbish to be thrown about in my mind.

I had to do without my dinner one Sunday because I would not learn the twenty-third Psalm, and, on being told I would have to do without my supper likewise, I ran off to my sister's.

I have read the Bible through twice, and parts of it many times, but on reading it the second time I became thoroughly convinced that it was untrue. When I reached that decision, or conclusion, I had not yet read anything but Christian doctrine, and it cannot be said that I was prejudiced against it by reading Ingersoll or Thomas Paine, for I had scarcely heard of them, and their works would no more have been permitted in my childhood's home than so many rattlesnakes. Although I have since read them, and am proud that I possess them, they in no way helped to form my conclusions. My earliest thoughts were these: What sense was there in Christ suffering on the cross when, if God was almighty, he could have saved man some other way? Then, I said to myself, what was it to die, knowing, as Christ must have known, that thereby he would receive great praise, honor, and glory? If Christ was the son of God he knew beyond a doubt that there was a future life, and what was it to him to quit this earth and go to paradise? How many men, and women, too, for that matter, have given their lives to save one or two without any hope of reward in this world or any other? Are they not more to be honored, and is the action not nobler than to die for reward? I have a thousand other thoughts, like these, useless to mention, but they all tend to the same conclusion that the Bible is the greatest fraud ever imposed on an otherwise intelligent people. Keep on showing the people the error of their way. Your efforts are not unappreciated, although there are many like myself who do not often take the opportunity to say so.

Yours for the right,

HARLAN C. WILLIAMS.

Where They Are Hard at Work.

PORTLAND, OR., May 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The old cry that Liberals cannot organize has surely been proven false by the Liberals of Oregon. I wish that some of the people who say that nothing can be done, fold their hands, and content themselves with kicking at the Bible and the churches, could walk into our Secular Sunday-school and watch the forty or fifty children, from two and one-half to eighteen years of age, go through with the exercises. The growth of our Sunday-school in the last four months has been something phenomenal. From six children last November we have increased to sixty, with an average attendance of nearly forty, and this means children only, the full attendance being from seventy to eighty. Last Sunday evening we gave an entertainment in which about twenty of the children took part, and to say it was a success is but a feeble expression. But for all this there is a good cause. We possess a prize in our lecturer, Miss Nettie A. Olds. She is a born teacher, speaker, and musician. Coupled with this she is full of energy, self-reliance, and enthusiasm; in fact, to use a homely phrase, she is a six-horse team in one. Although still very young, her lectures teem with brilliant and original thoughts, and she bids fair to become the female Ingersoll of the Pacific coast.

On the 27th ult. Miss Olds took twenty-two of our Sunday-school children to Vancouver, Wash., eight miles away, and gave an entertainment, followed by a dance. It was unanimously pronounced the best entertainment seen in Vancouver for years, and led to the organization of a Secular Sunday-school there, with a membership of fifty, which, taking into consideration that Vancouver is a Catholic stronghold, is remarkably good.

We expect to erect in Portland, in the near future, a hall, to be dedicated to the cause of Liberalism. We had the grand old worker in the cause of Mental Liberty, C. B. Reynolds, with us for a short time, but on account of sickness he was compelled to return home. We hope to have him with us again soon. If we had more workers in the field like Miss Olds, Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Smith, and Mr. Reynolds, we would have no fear of losing in the battle against superstition. THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other Liberal publications are of inestimable value, but the trouble is we are still short of preachers and papers that teach the truth; yet, if every Freethinker will only help in the work, we can accomplish much.

Miss Olds has also organized the Woman's Auxiliary of the First Secular Church, which meets every Wednesday afternoon. It now has over thirty members. When a woman says she will, she will and you can depend upon it, and when thirty or forty bright, intelligent women unite in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty, we can almost see the walls of the temples of superstition tremble. Mr. Reynolds has also organized the Secular Dramatic Company, which will produce some attractive dramas during the summer. This is beneficial and interesting to our young people. We must reach the children and the young folks. Christianity is a tangled skein, but easily enough unraveled if we only begin at the right end of the thread. Let each and all work hard and fast, for the "harvest is great and the laborers are few."

Yours for the cause of Truth and Right,

CHARLES HAGNER,

Pres. F. S. C. of Portland, Or.

Doesn't Agree with Brother Wakeman and the "World."

CLINT, TEX., April 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The good Christians of San Francisco have lately been overwhelmed with surprise and horrified at the terrible murders committed in the Emanuel Baptist church in that city. This shows that they don't read their Bibles, for if they did they would not be so astonished and shocked. Ever since the time of Eli, whose two sons were wont to lie in wait for the fair daughters of Zion "that assembled at the door of the Tabernacle," more or less of this sort of thing has been going on in the "holy temples" of the world. Women are inclined to superstition, are credulous, confiding, unsuspecting, and a church building dedicated to the God of their belief is, to their minds, invested with a kind of sanctity which makes them think that no harm can come to them within its sacred precincts. The sons of Eli in the pulpit, in the box of the confessional, the Sunday-school, or the melodious choir, know that it is the very place where they can most easily and securely accomplish any nefarious design they may harbor upon simple-minded, unsuspecting women.

But Durrant or Gibson, one or both of them, may say: "Hold on, old fellow, don't be so hard on the professors of Christianity; you are an infidel and haven't read the Bible. We refer you to the illustrious examples of David and Solomon, and more particularly to Numbers xxxi, for a justification, or, at least, mitigation, of recent transactions in our house of prayer and praise, which, to tell you the truth, out of deference to public opinion, we had hoped would never be discovered." Turning to the aforesaid chapter we can readily see how an out-and-out believer in the Holy Bible as the veritable word of God, with "the faith that enables one to remove mountains," much more the dead body of a beautiful girl up the steeple to the belfry—how such a one piously poring over the dealings of God with his chosen people and their Gentile neighbors, might be led to conclude that our modern ideas of good morals are entirely wrong, and our criminal codes cruel and barbarous. There we read that the Lord in person, assisted by his faithful lieutenants, Moses and Eleazar, commanded the butchery of thousands of captiv Midianite mothers for no other reason than that they were guilty of being mothers, and ordered to be saved for the use of the army, the congregation, the priests, or Levites, and the Lord, 32,000 young girls, and that the "tribute" of the Lord, or his share of those miserable maidens, was "thirty and two."

We are so fortunately, or unfortunately, constructed, mentally and morally, as not to be able to read this bloody page with other than feelings of abhorrence and detestation, for which, if not forgiven, according to orthodoxy, we must be damned—wherefore won't some of the learned divines of the day who have the ear of the deity and enjoy his special confidence, as, for instance, the Rt. Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, or his illustrious and holy reverence and eminence, Archbishop Corrigan, one or both of those brilliant luminaries of the theologic skies—won't he or they be good enough to read that chapter in Numbers to their congregations, mostly of gentle, kind-hearted women, and then preach a sermon on it and tell us to what use the Lord put those "thirty and two" innocent virgins. We know pretty well what the saints and the soldiers did with their shares, but would like to know from these holy and inspired ambassadors of the court of heaven what the Lord did with his share of thirty and two.

Reading this book as in part the doings of a tribe of savages just emerging from the plane of the unreasoning brute, it is understandable and, to some extent, instructive; but when I am told by a horde of hypocrites who make a living by teaching such stuff to the ignorant and credulous as the word or act of a God, I am filled with indignation at such insult to the intelligence and kindly instincts of our modern humanity.

History teaches that the church has ever been a good market for the consumption of virgins. The children of Israel, under the immediate protectorate of their great Jehovah, were large consumers of this kind of merchandise. After their and our great Jehovah had, for thousands of years, been experimenting with Adam and Noah, and Abraham and Moses, and found that his chosen people were getting worse and worse, while the Arabs and Persians and Greeks and Romans were forging ahead, ruling the world and making it better and more desirable to live in, he concluded to send his son to finish up the job at which he had failed, and of which he was tired, and to do this it was necessary to hunt up a virgin. The method of nature would not do; it was too commonplace, foul, and unclean. The Jews couldn't be fooled that way and they sent the son back to his father in a very undiplomatic and discourteous way, so, at least, the book states.

The adoption by the Roman church of the idea of the immaculate conception, based on the old falsehood of the impurity and foulness of maternity, and as a consequence the enforced celibacy of her priesthood, is a standing insult to every pure woman on the planet, and if they understood aright the vile reflection cast upon their sex they would never bow at her altars. Nature has given us Shakespeare and Humboldt, and Washington and Franklin and Jefferson and Paine and Darwin and Spencer, and hundreds of other glorious men and women. Contrast their work with that of the Hebrew crank who came, as he said, to bring not peace, but a sword (and well has he kept his word); who went about appropriating and destroying other people's property, cursing fig-trees for not bearing fruit out of season, and those who would not follow him, and who has left us examples and precepts which, if followed literally, would land any imitator in the poor-house or lunatic asylum within six months. As to his divine origin, all we have to go on is the testimony of a poor, ignorant, illiterate laborer who says that the angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream and told him thus and so. That angel of the Lord was, most likely, some lusty young rabbi who well knew how to play upon the dense stupidity and accompanying credulity of brother Joseph to cover up his own tracks. And yet upon this miserably flimsy foundation of a disgusting fiction was built the stupendous superstructure of the Christian religion which, for fifteen hundred years, obstructed the light of truth and reason and science, and cast its blighting, destroying shadow over half the planet. For one I am bound to ignore all hybrid stock, half celestial and half mundane, whether of Greek, Roman, or Hebrew origin, together with their spooks, ghosts, angels, devils, witches, wizards, and all that sort of nonsense.

To return for a moment to the temple Emanuel—suppose the irreligious people of that city should, after a fair trial, convict one or both of the accused church members. What of that? They have only by the exercise of their faith and the prayers of the clergy to take another dip, if deemed necessary, in "that fountain filled with blood drawn from Immanuel's veins," and if the rope is a good strong one they will be gently jerked to Jesus in a jiffy, and before the crowd assembled to witness their departure shall have dispersed, they will be receiving the congratulations of the elect in heaven and singing "farewell, vain world," to the accompaniment of their golden harps. So much for the great doctrine of the vicarious atonement, the cause of more immorality and crime than all the temptations of the world and the flesh without its potent encouragement. We poor infidels, having no Jesus to shift our wickedness upon, yet try to behave a little better than the Christians, not through fear of hell or hope of heavenly reward, but simply because it is right to do so as most promotive of the happiness of ourselves and others.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Trailing Arbutus.

I wandered lonely where the pine-trees made Against the bitter East their barricade,
And guided by its sweet
Perfume, I found within a narrow dell
The trailing spring flower, tinted like a shell,
Amid dry leaves and mosses at my feet.

From under dead bows, for whose loss the pines
Moaned ceaseless overhead, the blossoming vines
Lifted their glad sunshine,
While yet the bluebird smoothed, in leafless trees,
His feathers ruffled by the chill sea breeze,
And snow-drifts linger under April skies.

As, pausing, o'er the lonely flower I bent,
I thought of lives thus lowly, clogged and pent,
Which yet found room,
Through care and cumber, coldness and decay,
To lend a sweetness to the ungenial day,
And make the sad earth happier for their bloom.

—John G. Whittier

A Poem With a Moral.

Said one little chick, with a funny little squirm,
"I wish I could find a nice, fat worm."

Said another little chicken, with a queer little shrug,
"I wish I could find a nice fat bug."

Said a third little chick, with a strange little squeal,
"I wish I could find some nice, yellow meal."

"Now, look here," said the mother, from the green garden patch.
"If you want any breakfast you must get up and scratch."

—St. Nicholas.

Acknowledgment of Gift.

EDITOR OF CHILDREN'S CORNER: With much surprise and pleasure I received the gift, "Inquiere Island."

I wrote, thanking the author for the gift, and not knowing the exact address, I sent my letter to the place given by Mr. Genone at the head of his letter, but a few days ago it was returned. I was very sorry, for I wanted him to know that I was much pleased at receiving the book. So I take this means of sending him my thanks. My parents were as much pleased as myself.

I regret that he did not know of my receiving the book before. With sincere regards I remain your friend,

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I have just read your address on the "Progress of Woman" with much interest; and from your statements the women have been treated in a most horrible style, which I do not deny. Will you please refer me to histories (text-books) where I can get possession of the facts direct? Yours truly,

SPRING.

Winter has charms for the young and gay;
There's fun at evening call;
Skating and racing with horse and sleigh,
And dancing at the ball.

Winter is gone, and we do no wrong,
With frankness to say good-bye
When nature bursts in flower and song—
Though reviving the peaky fly.

The opening bud the air perfumes,
The bees begin to hum,
And many birds sing many tunes,
Now gentle spring has come.

In winter earth shows fiercer side,
As though 'twere racked with pain;
But budding spring, in flowery pride,
Brings kinder look again.

Each hath winter as well as spring,
Whatever we do or say;
But flowers of love will pleasure bring,
In winter as in May.

LILLIAN G. BOYD.

ROCKVILLE, IDA., May 2, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I wrote to the Corner. Rain has been falling steadily for two days, and it is awfully wet and muddy out doors, Rockville is only a little country post-office, and it is seven miles away from us. My brother Charles and I are saving you a collection of specimens, such as petrified wood, gypsum, rattlesnake rattles, Indian arrowheads, and other things we find on the hills. We are surrounded by hills and mountains. South of us is Mohogany mountain, covered with red mahogany. There hasn't been a preacher in our valley for over a year, for they don't bother us any more. There has been no school here since November last.

We all joined the Oregon State Secular Union, for we live about six miles over the Oregon line, though our postoffice is in Idaho. I would like to correspond with some of the Corner friends.

LAURA M. CARLTON.

[That must be a happy and harmonious community, where the teachers of superstition do not come, and if the young people are all as bright as our friend Laura, there need be no fear for the future. We shall be pleased with the promised collection of specimens, and thank Laura and her brother for their thoughtful kindness.—Ed. C. C.]

ORILLIA, ONT., May 1, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner and I hope it will not be the last. I am going to tell you about the town I live in; its name is Orillia and it is lovely in summer time, nearly every street being shaded with elm or maple trees. We go to a private park ourselves, and so do several of my aunts and uncles. It is on the lake shore and we have houses built there. In winter time here it is very disagreeable. Last winter it rained, then froze. The streets were like glass. It was good for coasting. You could have a long slide on a flat sidewalk. I think my letter is getting long. Hoping to see this in print, I remain, Your friend,

ELMA ALEXIA MOFFATT.

[We are pleased to gather Elma into the fold with our other bright lassies and lads, and hope she will write again. Take care to spell and punctuate correctly.—Ed. C. C.]

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., May 4, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I would have written before if I had not been too much occupied with my school studies. I expect to graduate next month, and as all the graduates have to write an essay the same is expected of me; this I think to be a very laborious task. For over a month there has been difficulty in maintaining the school on account of lack of funds in the treasury, but school will resume May 6th. I think Ida Ballou a very instructive writer for children and also for grown folks, and that she improves the Corner very much. Those Turkish tales must be very interesting and I would like to know where I can find them.

I would like very much to see some of your continued and instructive writings in the Corner. I like your short writings also.

I think you will soon hear from my friend Anna Barthorpe.

From a Liberal friend,

LOUISA IFFLAND.

[Do not wait so long before you write again, Louisa. We agree with you in regard to Ida Ballou's articles. She is one among our brightest correspondents.—Ed. C. C.]

CHILLICOTHE, O., April 27, E.M. 295.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: It has been quite a while since I wrote to you and the Corner friends. I wish every one may enjoy good health who reads my letter. I live one and one-quarter miles from Gillespieville, ten miles from Chillicothe, and six miles from the Scioto river. To-day is beautiful. The sun shines brightly, the birds twitter in their leafy retreats, and the grass is green. The earth is decked with white daisies here, and blue daisies there; the Johnny jump-ups are strewn all over the pasture, and flowers and ferns adorn the wildwood.

We take THE TRUTH SEEKER. One of my school-mates, a Christian, who belongs to the church and is in Harvey's advanced grammar, parsed "Lord" this way: "Lord is a noun, common"—here one of the class interrupted her and said—"It is a proper noun," but she did not understand; then she asked me whether it was feminine gender or neuter, but I said it was

A Chance to Make Money.

I have been so successful in the past few months that I feel it my duty to aid others by giving them my experience. I have not made less than $18 any day for the last five months, and have not canvassed any. I put a notice in the papers that I am selling the Iron City Dish Washer, and people send for them by the dozen. They give such good satisfaction that every family wants one. I think that any person can easily clear $10 a day, and double that after they get started good. I don't see why anyone should be destitute, when they may just as well be making lots of money if they try. Address the Iron City Dish Washer Co., 145 S. Highland Ave., Station A, Pittsburgh, Pa., and they will give you all instructions necessary to succeed. MRS. WM. H.

against rules to tell; and so finally she said, "feminine gender, third person plural number," and whatever case it happened to be. Then came the corrections: One of the class said it was singular number, as he guessed there was "but one of him." I then spoke up and said, "I always heard there were three of him: Father, Son, and Holy Ghost," and Mr. Stigler, our teacher, said, "Oh, no, one in three and three in one." I then inquired what rule in arithmetic he worked that by, but he stamped his foot and looked sour, and I did not say any more.

MAUD ETHEL CRYDER.

[We number Maud among our bravest and wittiest girls, one who is able to teach the teacher.—Ed. C. C.]

CROSBY, TEX., April 29, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will attempt to write again to the Children's Corner. I can't stay away long at a time. I have just read Colonel Ingersoll's interview on Sam Jones. I think he hit the nail on the head. The Rev. Sam Jones thought he was saying something bright when he said he couldn't see why men would pay for the privilege of hearing Ingersoll abuse their mother's God and their father's Bible at a dollar a head, and then turn out and be infidels like him for nothing. Then why do the people go to hear him tell a lot of falsehoods and then turn out and be hypocrites like him? He says, "Can Mr. Ingersoll show what he has done to make the world any better or happier?" Well, can Mr. Jones show what he has done to make the world any better? If he can, I would like to hear of it. I know one thing; where there is a church in a settlement, there is always a fuss and a row. If the preacher shakes hands with one and not with the whole congregation they get miffed about it. Your Liberal friend.

EDITORIAL

From the Freethought Magazine.

"The advertisement of that well known Freethinker and distinguished jeweler, Otto Wettstein, appears in our advertising pages. Mr. Wettstein is worthy of the patronage of the public. He is an honest man that can be trusted. Whatever he agrees to give you you are sure to get, as we have learned by experience. Brother Wettstein is doing grand, good work for the cause of Freethought, and is entitled to the consideration of the Liberal public."

The subject of the above eulogy claims no credit as a writer or scholar; his efforts in that line are crude, and simply the "Musings" of his few idle hours. But he does claim to be a first-class jeweler. Has worked at the bench for forty-five years; is a natural mechanic, art critic, acute judge of goods, close buyer, and does business on minimum degree of expense. His FREE-THOUGHT BADGE is conceded to be the most artistic and expressive emblem ever designed. His "OTTO WETTSTEIN" WATCH combines all the qualities of a first-class timekeeper at one-half the usual rates, and his COLONEL INGERSOLL SOUVENIR SPOON is without question, the finest specimen of the die-cutter's art ever produced. It is his aim now to establish himself as YOUR JEWELER.

Something
QUITE NEW & UNIQUE

THE
BETTER WORLD

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be.

So said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Published and for sale at this office. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

Cheap Tracts for Distribution to Start Christians Thinking.

If you want terse, trenchant reading matter, to act as "Eye-openers," in doing "Missionary Work," convenient to hand to neighbors, friends and all inquiring persons, send for a supply of these valuable little evangelists of truth.

They range in price from one to ten cents each. They are so low in price that thousands of generous-hearted persons can afford to buy them for gratuitous distribution. Too many of them cannot be spread broadcast over our land. Sent, post-paid, by mail.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE; OR THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D., with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

$679,694,439.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies. $1.00
Fifty copies. 4.50
One hundred copies. 8.00
Larger quantities at special rates.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

Is it possible that clouding the tender mind of the child with error will do it no harm?—Katie Kehm Smith.

THIS is philosophy: To make remote things tangible, common things extensively useful, useful things extensively common, and to leave the least necessary for the last.—W. S. Landor.

THE beliefs in natural law and the universality of causation are not very strong even in the scientific world when vital phenomena are in question, and they are very feeble in the outer world.—Herbert Spencer.

HENRY IV., after his victories, his abjuration, and his coronation, caused a cross to be erected in Rome, with the following inscription: In hoc signo vinces. The wood of the cross was the carriage of a cannon.—Voltaire.

VOLTAIRE! a name that excites the admiration of men, the malignity of priests. Pronounce that name in the presence of a clergyman, and you will find that you have made a declaration of war. Pronounce that name, and from the face of the priest the mask of meekness will fall, and from the mouth of forgiveness will pour a Niagara of vituperation and calumny. And yet Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men.—Ingersoll.
